VOL. XXI.....NO. 6381. NEW-YORK, SUNDAY, MARCH 3, 1872. PRICE FIVE CENTS.

ALBANY AFFAIRS.

Honorary Statues to Illustrious New-Yorkers.

Favorable Reports from the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Investigation into the Abuses of the New-York Street-Cleaning Contract.

Action of the Inhabitants of Brooklyn to Procure Rapid Transit.

Petition for the Abatement of the Manure Nuisance.

ALBANY, Saturday, March 2, 1872.

In both Houses of the Legislature today there were but few members in attendance. The sessions were short and destitute of special interest. Both Houses have taken recess, the Assembly until Monday evening, the Senate until Tuesday evening. The ostensible reason for the latter adjournment is the number of "town meetings" or Spring elections to be held at the beginning of next week, but the real reason is supposed by many to be something quite different, and there are several conflicting theories upon the subject. A numerous party suppose that the machinations of the Erie lobby have had some influence in procuring the result.

HONOR TO THE ILLUSTRIOUS DEAD.

The Governor sent a message to both Houses, today, informing them that there were two vacant niches in the old Hall of Representatives at Washington waiting to be filled with statues of the illustrious departed of this State, and recommended that the subjects for the same should be Gov. GEORGE CLINTON and ROBERT FULTON. The recommendation involves an appropriation from the State, and the message was accordingly referred to the Ways and Means Committee, in the Assembly, and in the Senate, to a special committee, consisting of Senators MADDEN, LEWIS and LOAN.

JURORS IN THE CITY AND COUNTY OF NEW-YORK.

The Senate Judiciary Committee reported favorably the bill in reference to jurors in New-York. This is an act introduced by Mr. BENEDICT, exempting ministers of the Gospel, professors and teachers in colleges, academies or public schools, practising physicians and dentists having patients requiring their daily attention, and lawyers in actual practice, when not engaged in any other business. This bill must not be confounded with the Grand Jury bills heretofore noticed.

FACTORY CHILDREN.

The same Committee reported favorably the bill for the protection of factory children, requiring that they shall have the privilege of attending school and providing for the appointment, by the Governor, of an inspector who shall have the right of visitation of all factories where minors are employed, and shall see that the provisions of the law are complied with.

NOTARIES PUBLIC.

The bill to authorize Notaries Public to act in every county within the limits of the State was reported back to the Senate today favorably, but with an amendment. The bill met with considerable opposition in Committee, and was likely at one time to be defeated, but through the efforts of Senator WM. H. ROBERTSON it was so amended as to limit its operation to Notaries appointed for the Counties of New-York and Kings, who are authorized to act indiscriminately in either county, and in that shape it will probably pass.

DESBROSSES-STREET.

Mr. BENEDICT's bill, introduced in the Senate today, relative to this street, provides that it shall be continued to Varick-street, from its present termination at Hudson-street.

THE INSURANCE SUPERINTENDENCY.

A communication was presented and read, in the Assembly, to-day, from the Insurance Superintendent, explaining his apparent neglect to comply with the resolution of February 17, calling for the evidence taken on the investigation of the Mutual Life Insurance Company during the past year. The resolution calling for the evidence, it appears, was not received by him on the 27th ult., and the answer of the Superintendent, which has been considered by many members a contempt of the authority of the House, was, as he now explains, intended simply to ascertain the wishes of the Assembly as to whether it should transmit the original testimony, or should take time to have a copy of the same prepared, as the resolution contemplated. This will, probably, be satisfactory to the Assembly.

STREET CLEANING IN NEW-YORK.

A resolution was introduced and adopted in the Assembly this morning directing the Committee on Public Health to investigate the workings of the street-cleaning contract in New-York, and also into street cleaning performed by the Department of Public Health in New-York. The Committee have power to send for persons and papers. A similar investigation was ordered prior to the recess, but the Committee dispersed before the proper notices had been given, and it was found impossible to get them together.

RAPID TRANSIT IN BROOKLYN.

M. BERRY, of Brooklyn, introduced a bill today to authorize the construction of a tunnel through Atlantic avenue, in East New-York, with a branch to Coney Island. The tunnel in Atlantic avenue is already partly completed, the Long Island Railroad Company having formerly made use of one from the South Ferry to Smith-street, which although built for a tunnel, has been used as a trench. The plan of reopening and continuing it seems with general favor from the authorities and people of your sister city, and as the soil at Kings County permits of rapid excavation, you may expect to see quick transit as accomplished fact on the opposite side of the river long before the contending factions have settled upon the most feasible plan for New-York.

NUISANCES ON NEW-YORK DOCKS.

Mr. MOULTON, of New-York, presented a petition from some 150 residents of the upper portion of the City, complaining of the nuisance occasioned by the manure depot extending from Forty-fourth to Forty-seventh-street, on the East River, which they pronounce deleterious and injurious to health. He offered a resolution requiring the subject requiring the Board of Health to report within ten days all the facts and circumstances of the case, and whether any additional legislation is required to give the Board power to abate the nuisance.

Message from the Governor Recommending that Statues be Erected in Honor of Fulton and Clinton.

The Governor sent the following message, by the hand of his Private Secretary, Col. VAN BUREN:

STATE OF NEW-YORK,
EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
ALBANY, March 2, 1872.

To the Legislature:

I call your attention to the second section of an act of Congress passed in 1864 (chapter 215 of the Laws of that year) under which an invitation was extended, through the Department, to the States of the Union to provide and furnish statues, not exceeding two in number for each State, of deceased persons who have been citizens thereof, and distinguished for their historic renown as for distinguished civic or military services; which statues are to be placed in a hall in the Capitol at Washington, set apart by Congress for the purpose, being the former Hall of House of Representatives. If my only recently been made known to me that this invitation was, then, received from the Congress.

States of the States have already complied with the request of the Federal Government; others have made arrangements for doing so; and it seems to me that our own great State ought not to be behind-hand in contributing to this proper commemoration, at the Federal Capital, of men who have conferred distinction upon our country.

I commend to your consideration the propriety of making immediate provision for the accomplishment, on the part of this State, of its share of the work proposed.

Without wishing to interfere with the discretion of the Legislature in the matter, I respectfully suggest that, in case you decide to furnish the two statues, your choice may, with great propriety, fall upon GEORGE CLINTON, who was the first Governor of the State, and whose public services in the revolutionary period of our history were of marked merit; and upon ROBERT FULTON, who, in private station, contributed in a very eminent degree as well to the renown as to the prosperity of New-York.

JOHN T. HOFFMAN.

THE STATE LEGISLATURE.

SENATE.....ALBANY, N. Y., March 2.

The following bills were reported:

To amend the New-York City and County Jury act.
To protect the creditors of moneyed institutions.
To protect factory children.
Providing more stringent punishment for the crime of abortion.
Extending the powers of notaries public in the City and County of New-York.

Reported adversely: The bill to regulate freights on railroads, which report was laid on the table.

The Auditor of the Canal Department, in answer to a resolution, transmitted a report of moneys expended on various divisions of the canal, which was ordered to be printed.

Much time was consumed on motions to adjourn, and it was finally decided that when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn until Tuesday evening.

After disposing of a number of local bills on general orders, the Senate adjourned.

ASSEMBLY.

The Governor sent in a communication to the Legislature calling attention to the law of Congress passed in 1864, inviting the several States to place statues of eminent citizens in the old Hall of Representatives in Washington, and recommending two statues. The Governor urged attention to this matter, and suggested GEORGE CLINTON and ROBERT FULTON as fitting subjects for such statues.

The Deputy Superintendent of the Insurance Department, in answer to a resolution of the House, sent in a communication, transmitting testimony taken in the examination of the affairs of the New-York Mutual Life Insurance Company, together with the report, and also stating that the former resolution was delayed in its delivery, and was indistinct as to whether the original testimony should be transmitted or a copy thereof.

The Senate bill to amend the charter of Cohoes was passed.

The bill is specific with regard to duties and powers.

RAPID TRANSIT IN BROOKLYN.

By Mr. BURNS—To incorporate the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Railway Company; the incorporators being ROBERT TURNER, MORRIS REYNOLDS and others; the capital stock is fixed at $500,000 to commence with. The road is to commence at South Ferry, in Brooklyn, and run easterly through Atlantic avenue to the corporate limits and further to Jamaica. The road then branches off in various directions.

RIGHTS OF RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Mr. MACRAY called up the following resolutions adopted yesterday, and moved for their adoption, which was carried:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the State be requested to furnish this body with his legal opinion, whether the laws of this State, incorporated under the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of this State, and having the right of eminent domain as to take private property for public use, have not a right, on the public requiring the use of the roads which such companies represent, beyond an amount sufficient to pay the necessary expenses of operating such roads, and a fair and just return on the actual cost thereof.

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be also requested to furnish his opinion whether or not any act of the Legislature can be held as constitutional which may authorize such companies to increase their capital stock or stockholding indebtedness, and impose burdens on the public to pay interest or dividends on such increase, or whether such increase is based on the surplus earnings of such railroads, or whether such increase represents an increased value of private property appropriated by such company for a public use.

THE MANURE NUISANCE.

Mr. MOULTON applied the resolution, which was adopted, calling on the Board of Health of New-York to report within ten days whether the nuisance of a manure depot has been established along the East River front in mid-City, between Forty-fourth to Forty-seventh-street, if true, and by whose authority such nuisance was established.

The House then adjourned till 7½ P. M. on Monday.

WISCONSIN.

The Approaching Republican Convention—A Legislative Muddle—The State Going for Grant.

MILWAUKEE, Wednesday, Feb. 28, 1872.

The Republican State Convention to select delegates to the National Presidential Convention has been called for the 13th of March, by authority; and no change in the time is mediated, certain rumors circulated by the Chicago Times to the contrary notwithstanding. Ex-Gov. FAIRCHILD is prominently named as one of the probable delegates at large. It would be a just selection, and Hon. WILLIAM E. SMITH, a prominent candidate for the gubernatorial nomination last Fall, ought in all fairness to be his colleague. Wisconsin, at any rate, may be relied on to send a united Grant delegation to the Philadelphia Convention. The Democratic State Central Committee are awaiting developments before calling their Delegate Convention. But DOOLITTLE's espousal of the passive policy is pretty good assurance, and the best we have at the present time, that the Wisconsin Democracy will go against it. The unveiled of the Badger State remember with a tincture of animosity how utterly the "earnest man" befuddled them in the last campaign for Governor.

THE LEGISLATURE.

The Wisconsin Legislature has been putting irons in the fire all Winter, till they have become rather too plenty now to fashion and finish them all before the session closes. Besides, much that has been done is quite likely to become null and void on account of the probability that the Supreme Court will decide the new constitutional amendment, adopted by the people last Fall to provide against local legislation, a constitutional "constitutional amendment." The Legislators of this session have gone on the supposition that the amendment was unconstitutional, and have passed a larger number of local bills than usual. A provident committee to report a bill in compliance with the terms of which local measure might be considered legislated upon without further ceremony, was appointed early in the session, but it has as yet done nothing. The muddle is bad and promises to get worse.

The latest report on the redistricting of the State gives the Democrats two districts out of the eight under the new apportionment. These two comprise respectively the counties of Milwaukee, Ozaukee and Washington, and the counties of Fond de Lac, Sheboygan and Manitowoc, and are numbered the Fourth and Fifth Districts. The remaining six districts are safely Republican, and the whole of the State is possibly attainable in the progress of time and civilization.

The Temperance bill, modeled after the Ohio law, passed the Assembly today by a vote of 49 yeas to 45 nays. Its passage in the Senate is considered doubtful, and will go either way by a close vote. Both the friends and foes of the bill have been remarkably active during its pending, and every constituency has duly instructed its representative. The result will probably be the will of the people literally.

A GIFT SUITABLE.

You have already had an announcement by telegraph of the handing of the so-called Medical Registery Gift Enterprise affair in this city. CHARLES D. SMITH, the bottom scoundrel in the affair, has escaped on $500 bail, and left the cooler localities. The scare has been pretty extensively laid by the wise sayings and many people in this and adjoining States have been badly cheated in its meshes before the threads were cut by the Press. But the whole transaction has been a useful lesson to the North-west. Gift concert swindles have been too plenty among us during late years, and the more startling the cheats the better for the cheated. Some half a dozen similar enterprises in Wisconsin are now pending, but since the break-up of SMITH & Co., the State Press has come down on them solidly, and a general suspending of them is expected.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The northeastern burnt district of the State is coming up finely. Peshtigo has about one hundred good business buildings completed, besides the temporary and permanent dwellings, of which nearly every surviving, formerly resident, family has one. The pinaries were never so actively besieged. LUTE.

WASHINGTON NEWS.

Demonstration to the Japanese Embassy—Re-Adoption of Mediation Currency—Establishment from Grants and Molasses.

WASHINGTON, March 2.—Mr. JAS. BROOKS, on Monday, after the reception of the Japanese Embassy at the White House, will give a dinner to the Embassy, to which are invited the President and Cabinet, foreign Ministers, and many members of the House of Representatives. This entertainment is in return for the many hospitalities received by Mr. BROOKS from distinguished Japanese during his sojourn in their country. The President today sent an invitation to the Japanese to visit the Metropolitan Methodist Episcopal Church to-morrow.

CURRENCY STATEMENT.

Fractional currency received from the printing division of the Treasury during the week, $644,000; shipments, $433,000; shipment of notes, $1,080,000. The Treasurer holds as security for national bank circulation, $373,625,250, and for deposits of public money, $15,659,000; national bank circulation outstanding at this date, $321,180,779; internal revenue receipts today, $701,000, and for the fiscal year to date, $82,626,351, and for the current month to date, $1,546,000.

WHISKY AND RUM DISTILLATION.

A summary statement of the grain and molasses distilleries in operation during the month of February show a list of 350 distilleries of both grades, with a daily producing capacity of 365,304 gallons, an increase of 95,901 gallons daily over the report for January, 1872. The report also shows an increase of 20 distilleries during the month. The principal distilleries are located as follows: In Illinois, 47; Indiana, 23; Kentucky, 34; New-York, 14; Ohio, 57; Pennsylvania, 46, and Missouri, 19.

MUTILATED CURRENCY.

The Secretary of the Treasury has decided that it is the duty of bank depositories situated within the limits of the Government contract with Adams Express Company to receive and redeem defaced and mutilated currency under the Treasurer's late Circular No. 7, on the same terms as the other depositories, and that the expense of forwarding such currency to the Treasurer will be borne by the Department, the banks to prepay the charges to the nearest point within the contract, and to be reimbursed by the Department.

Congressional Proceedings.

SENATE.....WASHINGTON, D. C., March 2.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented a number of memorials of lumbermen in the North-west, setting forth the reasons why the Chicago Relief bill ought not to pass.

Mr. LOGAN read a letter in favor of its passage.

Mr. WINDOM and Mr. FERRY presented memorials for a modification of the Homestead laws.

Mr. CASSERLY presented the petition of the leading bankers and merchants of San Francisco for a reform in the Civil Service.

Mr. KELLOGG offered a resolution, which was agreed to, directing the Secretary of the Navy to transmit all the information he may be able to obtain, showing what portion, if any, of the wharf of the river frontage of the Port of New-Orleans is now claimed or occupied by the Government, and if so, upon what ground and for what purpose the same is so claimed or occupied.

PROSECUTION OF NEW-YORK MERCHANTS.

Mr. BAYARD moved to take up his resolution asking for copies of the instructions given to the District-Attorney of New-York relative to the prosecution of merchants.

Mr. CONKLING said the instructions were fully published in the newspapers. There was, therefore, no need for the resolution. It was unnecessary, and he thought it would be better to wait until he and others could express their views of the resolution and of Mr. BAYARD's motives in offering it.

Mr. BAYARD replied that if he had heard a speech on a more proper time Mr. CONKLING would have been the first to call him to order. The allusion to his motives he thought ungracious and peculiarly ignorant, as he was the only person who had been silent in regard to his public remarks yesterday. Besides, judging from Mr. CONKLING's action in reference to the reorganization of the Retrenchment Committee and its members, he (Mr. BAYARD) could hardly understand his (BAYARD's) motives. He did intend to comment on the conduct of the officers who had given the information, but he did not think it was in accordance with its intention, and he had asked, for it in the usual and the only proper way.

Mr. TRUMBULL moved to adjourn, which was carried—yeas, 32; nays, 11—and at 2 P. M. the Senate adjourned.

Mr. PRATT's Beaver Lake bill passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met as in Committee of the Whole, Mr. WILSON, of Ohio, in the chair, and from twenty to twenty-five minutes of the morning hour, a number of speeches were made on miscellaneous subjects.

A TALK BY THE GOVERNOR.

What He Said to the Newsboys and Bootblacks—He Would Rather be a Good Bootblack than a Poor President.

The newsboys and bootblacks of Albany were given a dinner on Thursday evening, and among the distinguished persons present to speak encouraging words to them was Gov. HOFFMAN. He was received with great applause by the enthusiastic audience, and is reported by the Albany Evening Times as speaking as follows:

"Boys," said he, "I'm right glad to see you, and you seem glad to see me. I saw by one of the newspapers I was going to make a speech to the newsboys and bootblacks. It's no such thing; I am just going to talk to you. (Cheers.) The idea of my speaking on such an occasion is not according to Gunther. Here are the newsboys and bootblacks, and that is all right. Boys, this is a 'first edition;' it's a regular 'shine 'em up' sort of an affair. Now, I like boys; always did like boys; haven't forgot I was a boy myself. Sometimes I go out in the morning after the Capitol and the Cathedral and comes in bowing, hat in hand, and says, 'I am glad to see you, Governor, that was a splendid message you sent in yesterday,' and I don't know whether he means it or not. Then I go out into the street, and the boys say, 'How are ye, Governor,' and I know they mean that. Now, I'm talkin' to you, and you're bootblacks and boot-blacks are in the same business, both have something to do with the understanding, and that is all right. There is nothing in this world like a good clear head, and newsboys help to make that, that is if they sell the right sort of papers. The next thing to a clear head and an easy conscience for a man's comfort is a clean and easy pair of boots. You are pretty much all the same size and size, though it is pretty hard to tell how old boys are nowadays. Some boys go to Sunday-school and get a first addition for a second. Now, that isn't right; boys, it isn't right. Bootblacks, attend to your boots, or sweeping store, or in the State House, always be right on the square. Never try to get the best of anybody, except in the right way—by getting up a little earlier in the morning, or taking a little more energy, but never in any dishonorable way. Now, I know sometimes men not boys together and tell them if they only do so and so they will all be great men. Well, they may. Some one of you may become the President of the United States; but I would not try for it if I were you, for two reasons; first, if you try too hard, you will be pretty sure not to get it; and then if you get it, it is doubtful if you would give very good satisfaction. I had rather be a good bootblack than a poor President. Any boy, if he works hard, saves his money, takes opportunity to improve himself, may become an editor or publisher of some great newspaper. From editor newspapers become men and to be a Governor man and senator. Now, I'm talkin' to you. Newspapers for other boys to sell. So it is with bootblacks. Some of the biggest hotels in the country are run by men who began life as boot-blacks; then they got to be porters; then something else about the hotel, and finally got to be owners. I only speak of these positions as connected with my city. Many men have risen along well in the world if you only try hard; it is the right way, and now the right way to get alongside-narrow is to get a good stomachful to-night. There will be only one other speech, which will be the best of the evening, and that, boys, we suppose. I have had what is a first edition of a good supper, and I am ready for the speech and I'm tired. I may not be here, but others will. And now I wish you all a good evening, meaning you I am always glad to see you, and to hear you say, 'How are you, Governor?'"

THE SNOW-STORM.

Heavy Fall of Snow Throughout the Country—Damage to Shipping in Savannah—The Norfolk Steamers Weather Bound.

Yesterday was the second day of Spring, according to the almanac. In the morning dark clouds, sheltering the hidden storm, hung over the City, and a chill wind blew. The thermometer marked during the day as follows: At 6 A. M., 26°; 11 A. M., 24°; 3 P. M., 29°; 9 P. M., 30°. Barometer, 30.10; 30.06; 30.05; 30.10. Corresponding date last year: Thermometer, 42°, 49°, 54°, 49°. During the past week it has averaged from 18° to 19° above zero at midnight, and between 30° to 35° at midday, declining to the former figures as night drew on. The snow of which we had been forewarned by the Washington Bureau commenced to fall about 8 o'clock, and continued to do so up to an early hour this morning. The fall was heavy. Travel was impeded; the street cars "doubled up" their teams, which, of course, lessened the number of cars on the tracks, consequently about one out of every four persons who wanted to ride were unable to find even standing room. On the North and East Rivers the ferry-boats had some difficulty in crossing, and had to find their docks more by the sound of the bells, which were kept constantly ringing, than by the usual lights. The Jersey City ferry-boat Newark took two hours to reach the New-York side. She started at 8 o'clock and did not arrive till 10 o'clock. The passengers were in a state of great consternation, and it was as much as they could do to keep themselves warm, for all the steam that could be made was required to propel the boat through the ice, so that the heating apparatus rendered no service. The mails arrived at the Post-office little behind their usual time, but some delay may be occasioned to those which arrive at an early hour today.

The Storm Elsewhere—Heavy Fall of Snow.

The storm also prevails in several other States, in some of which it is said the like has not been experienced since 1857.

WASHINGTON, March 2.—The severest snow-storm here for several years commenced as an early hour this morning, and continued without interruption until late in the day, but the weather is clear to-night. There is good sleighing.

PHILADELPHIA, Penn., March 2.—A violent snow-storm is prevailing here.

LEWES, Del., March 2.—A thick east north-east snow-storm set in this forenoon.

BALTIMORE, March 2.—A fierce snow-storm set in here at 8 o'clock this morning.

RICHMOND, Va., March 2.—The severest storm since January, 1857, is now prevailing here. It has been snowing heavily for twelve hours, and still continues, with winds from the north-west, blowing a hurricane, and the snow is drifting accordingly.

SAVANNAH, Ga., March 2.—There was a severe storm of wind and rain here last night. Two ships, two barks and five schooners were driven from their moorings. The damage done was slight except to the hoisting machine on the Baltimore steamer wharf, which was totally destroyed.

CHARLESTON, S. C., March 2.—A severe north-east storm prevailed here last night. No damage was done in the harbor, but it is supposed to have been heavy on the coast.

BOSTON, March 2.—A northwesterly snow-storm commenced here at four o'clock this afternoon.

NORFOLK, Va., March 2.—A terrific gale, accompanied with sleet and snow, prevailed all day. All steamers advertised to sail today will defer their departure until the storm abates. High tides, caused by the wind, covered many of the wharves with two feet of water. The telegraph lines on the Norfolk side of the river were prostrated by the storm.

Storm and Probabilities.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 2—7 P. M.—The area of low barometer, which, on Friday evening, was south of Western Florida, has rapidly moved north-eastward, as a severe storm over the South Atlantic coast, and is now probably central some distance off the New-Jersey coast. The area at rain extended into North Carolina, and, as snow, from Eastern Tennessee and Virginia to Massachusetts; clearing weather, with north-westerly winds from the lower Mississippi Valley eastward over the South Atlantic States and into Virginia. The pressure has diminished from the lower Missouri Valley to the upper lakes, with cloudy weather and occasional light snow from Illinois and Wisconsin westward; and an area of low barometer has advanced into Iowa. The temperature has decidedly risen from the Gulf to the Lower Ohio Valley, thence to Lake Superior and westward. The rivers have risen at Pittsburgh, Vicksburg, and fallen at St. Louis and New-Orleans.

PROBABILITIES.

The very low barometer of the New-Jersey coast will probably move north-eastward during the night, with similar barometer over the South Atlantic and Middle States; diminishing north-westerly and westerly winds and clearing weather; the falling barometer of the New-England States to-night be succeeded on Sunday by rising barometer with clearing weather and north-westerly and westerly winds, the latter diminishing in force; falling barometer and rising temperature and winds backing to southerly, with probably threatening weather, prevail over the Western Gulf States during the night, and extend eastward over the Eastern Gulf States on Sunday; increased cloudiness and probably threatening weather from the Ohio Valley northward over the upper lake region; rising barometer and north-westerly winds extend westward over the North-west during the night. Dangerous winds are not anticipated for the Gulf and Atlantic coasts this evening, except possibly for New-Jersey, north eastward.

SUPPLEMENTARY WEATHER REPORT.

Snow has been reported from Baltimore, Boston, Buffalo, Cape May, Chicago, Keokuk, Knoxville, Lynchburg, Milwaukee, Nashville, New-London, New-York, Norfolk, Va., Philadelphia, St. Paul and Virginia City. A heavy north-east snow-storm has prevailed in this city today. Rain has been reported from Augusta, Charleston, Jacksonville, Portland, Oregon, and Washington. A heavy north-east rainstorm was reported last night from Savannah; six inches of rain have fallen during the last twenty-four hours.

The Acquittal of Josiah Ward on His Third Trial.

From the Philadelphia Post, March 1.

Yesterday, in Camden, the pleadings in the case of JOSIAH WARD closed about 12 o'clock, and Judge WOODHULL proceeded to charge the Jury. He recited the law and several decisions in cases where parties have been arraigned on circumstantial evidence, and dwelt upon the testimony of the various witnesses. He distinctly avowed his opinion that, whatever might be the personal views entertained of the guilt or innocence of the accused, there was not sufficient evidence to convict him of the killing of JOHN WADDY, as charged in the indictment. He, therefore, peremptorily ordered the jury to return a verdict of "not guilty," informing them that if they did so, he would then convict him, he (the Judge) would not allow the verdict to be entered, and after a short absence they returned with a verdict of acquittal, in accordance with the instructions of the Court. Ward was then discharged, and the prisoner, JOSIAH WARD, accused was accordingly set free, with his family, to-day. In the afternoon he was seen at home.

Thus ends the most celebrated criminal case ever tried in this County, the Courts of Charles County, Md., eight days having been occupied in the three trials which have taken place, costing the county about $20,000. The land taken in the closing of the case created intense excitement among all classes in Camden during the remainder of the day, the general impression was that the prisoner would be convicted, as it was said that the jury, up to the peremptory order of the Court, stood eleven for conviction and one for acquittal.

OPENING OF THE CAMPAIGN.

Political Meeting in Concord—Addresses by Prominent Republicans.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

CONCORD, N. H., March 2.—The canvass in New-Hampshire has become intensely exciting, and both parties are making every effort to secure a victory. A large Republican meeting was held to-night in this city, which was addressed by Hon. JAMES F. WILSON, of Iowa, and Hon. GEO. C. MCKEE, of Mississippi. The latter gentleman, who spoke first, claimed that Southern outlawry was the outgrowth of Democratic successes in the North, as there were, after every victory of that party, those fresh outbreaks of Ku-Klux savagery. In the interest of peace and good Government in the South, he asked that New-New-Hampshire erect Democracy. Mr. WILSON spoke one hour, saying it was the privilege of New-Hampshire to first stir the political waters in 1872, and that it was important that this stirring should be such as would enable the Republican Party to complete the great work in which it was engaged. He then went on to review the history of both parties, showing that the Republican Party had redeemed every pledge it ever made, while the Democrats had failed to make good any promise made to the people, except that to enforce the Fugitive Slave law. He read from the report of the Democratic minority Ku-Klux Committee, recently made to Congress, to show that the Democratic Party intended to overthrow all that the Republicans had done, and exhorted his hearers to sustain the party which had proved true to the people. There was, doubtless, he said, corruption in the Republican Party, and he did not defend it, but, on the contrary, heartily approved the policy of the party, which was to discover all corruption, and root it out. As to the charge that the present Administration was corrupt, nothing could be more false. GRANT, beginning with the Internal Revenue Bureau, which, when he entered, had been cut out, had yet collected in his first year as much, within six millions, as JOHNSON had in his last year, and he claimed this fact showed that the public money had not been stolen. The steady reduction of taxation and of the debt was an additional proof of the same fact. The speech, which was listened to with rapt attention, and was frequently interrupted by hearty applause. E. CANADA AND ENGLAND.

What Hon. Joseph Howe Said at Ottawa About the Withdrawal of the British Troops—A Bitter Denunciation of England's Action.

The special correspondent of the Toronto Globe says that the following is that portion of the lecture delivered by Hon. JOSEPH HOWE, Secretary of State for the Canadian Provinces, before the Young Men's Christian Association in Ottawa, on Tuesday night last, which has been taken exception to in the Canadian Cabinet, and which has led to the suppression of the entire speech by the local Press. The correspondent says that this report may be relied on as accurate, and the Globe says, editorially, that, "coming from a Cabinet Minister, whose political chief signed the Washington Treaty a few weeks ago, the language of Mr. HOWE is at once incomprehensible and astounding."

"We must be able to do our share to meet the requirements of this position they must endeavor to grasp the whole Dominion; and he would add that in no country he had ever heard or read of, in ancient or modern times, was the strain on the mental and bodily powers of the whole population greater than it was in this Dominion. We could afford to have a laggard, an idiot, or a coward; there were not 4,000,000 of us all told, and we had undertaken to govern half a continent, with 40,000,000 of ambitious and aspiring people on the other side of a frontier 3,000 miles long. If each British American could spend five years, we should not have more than half the brain power and physical force necessary to keep our rivals in check, and to make our position secure. To enable them correctly to estimate their true position, it would only be necessary to inquire into the reasons why France, with a warlike population of thirty millions, armed with fetlocks, and with his capital elaborately protected by engineering skill, was during the last summer overrun, beaten down and stripped of hundreds of millions of pounds by the victorious Prussians. What was the explanation of the extraordinary military phenomena? It had to be ascribed to the fact that, in 71 to 72, simply that the Prussians contrived to have one man and a half, and sometimes two to one, on nearly every battle-field where they met their enemies. Whether they were better prepared, whether their combinations were more scientific, or their strategy was more perfect, may be a matter of controversy, but one thing it had enabled us to study the aspects of the war, the French were overpowered because they were outnumbered. In any contest with our neighbors, assuming that we were united to a man, if the enemy knew his business we must expect to have ten men to one opposed to our battle-guns, or bundles of bullets, wherever the weapon might be—so that they would perceive that they must face at least five or six times the odds by which the French were overpowered. But that was not the worst of it. Ten children were born on the other side of the line for every one born on this, and however we might change the proportions by increased energy, five emigrants went to the United States for every one that came to Canada, so that at the end of every decade, the disproportions would be multiplied to our disadvantage. We might overlook these inequalities and live in a dream of security and security, if we were what we would fain be, our descendants, and prepare for them with a clear appreciation of their magnitude. But it might be said, Were we not a part of the great empire upon which the sun never sets, which contains three hundred millions of people, whose wealth defied estimate, whose fleets and armies, well disciplined, and whose great navy dominated the seas? What had we to fear when such an empire protected us? This was our ancient faith and ground boast. Under every trial, in the full belief that they were British subjects, that the allegiance which they had to the Crown of England entitled them to protection, our forefathers helped to conquer and organized these provinces. But of late new doctrines had been propounded in the mother country. The disorganization of the empire had been openly promulgated in leading organs. Our brethren within the narrow seas had been counseled to adopt a narrow policy to call home their legions, leave the provinces without sympathy or protection; and under the influences of panic and imaginary battles of Dorking, troops were to be massed in the British Islands, and their places were to be surrounded by iron-clads. One Cabinet Minister told them that British America could not be depended upon; another that he hoped the whole dominion would peacefully repose and grumble under republican institutions; and the third, on the eve of negotiations that were to involve our dearest interests, stripped Canada of every soldier, gathered up every old sentry-box and gun-carriage that he could, and shipped them off to England. He did not desire to anticipate the full discussions which Parliament would give to England's recent diplomatic efforts to buy her own peace at the sacrifice of our interests, or to that comedy of errors into which she had blundered. But he might say that the time was rapidly approaching when Canadians and Englishmen must have a clear understanding as to the obligations of the future. If Imperial policy is to cover the whole ground upon the basis of which our forefathers settled and improved, let this be understood. We will know then what to do. But if shadows, clouds and darkness were to rest upon the future, if thirty millions of Britons were to board their rural counters within two small islands, gather round them the troops and war-ships of the Empire, and leave four millions of Britons to face forty millions, and to defend a frontier of three thousand miles, then, let us know what we may expect, and our future policy would be governed by knowledge. Mr. Cabinet had yet dared to thrust his thoughts and give it utterance. Election newspapers had told us that our presence within the Empire was a source of weakness. Our fathers experienced, we appreciating all the benefits of the connection with Lords and Commoners, had sometimes told us we might go when we were inclined. As yet neither the Crown, Parliament nor people of England had deliberately avowed this policy of disintegration. Let them understand the tendency of this thought and language, and let us have the conviction that the drift was all that way. The Jesuit French made the conquest of Canada; but it was without anxiety for the future, but with a firm reliance on the goodness of Providence and our ability to so manage the young of our country as to protect us by our will, should Englishmen, unmindful of the past, repudiate their sacredest obligations.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

A LYRIC OF LIFE.

Said one to me: "I seem to be—
Like a bird blown out to sea,
In the hurricane's wild track—
Lost, wing-weary, beating back Vainly toward a fading shore,
It shall rest on nevermore."

Said I: "Spirit, spread your wings
Over all the waters wide, Spread your wings upon the blast,
Let it bear you far and fast;
In some sea, where sunbeams shine, Succor shall you find at last."

This soul then said: "Would I were dead—
Billows rolling o'er my head!
Those that sail the ships will cast Stormwrecks back into the blast;
Omend evil will their spell,
What the hurricane lets fall."

For my reply: "Beneath the sky Countless isles of beauty lie;
Waits upon the ocean thrown,
After tossings long and lone,
To those blessed shores have come,
Finding there love, heaven, and home."

This soul to me: "The seething sea,
Tossing hungry under me,
I fear to trust the ship I fear;
I see no isle of beauty near;
Why, I was fool enough today to let my imagination tell me I descried past a figure like his as we came out of church. Silly!
It is contemptible weakness. I must throw it off," she said, unclasping her hands with an impatient gesture; and calling to her dog, a little terrier, "Come, Ruby, we must go and get papa's tea ready."

Hearing her father's voice in the garden, Esther went round the house to see if he wished her, and found him standing beside the wooden gateway, speaking to the gardener.

"This ivy wants looking after, too," he was saying to the gardener, as she came up.
"It's going too much over to the road. Come here, Esther. I've been talking to James about these rockeries. They are far too formal—stuck up there like the four corners of the earth. We must have them altered at all hazards.
I daresay it will take a little time and labor, perhaps a week; and James here wants some one to assist him. Is there no able-bodied fellow among these poor people of yours who might be of use to us?"

"No, papa, not one; they are mostly children and old women."

"Helloa!" exclaimed Mr. Raymond.
"What's that? I thought I heard a noise, like some one coughing, among the ivy, on the other side there."

So he had. Our friend Fred had come down from London that day, had been to church, and had seen Miss Raymond there;
and after a late dinner at a neighboring inn had strolled down toward the villa, not in hopes of seeing her, but simply because he took pleasure in the thought that he was near her. He had been taking his last turn when he was arrested by the sound of Esther's voice, and breathless, and for the moment powerless to move, he had heard the few words of conversation as to the garden improvements and the extra labor required.

The noise which Mr. Raymond had heard was Fred leaving, half alone. By Jove, I'll be off," he muttered to himself, the words which he checked himself, and a strain of music discovered, walked softly away and continued his thoughts in silence. "By Jove, I'll do it," he repeated. "I must take the last train up, though, and see Travers, and get old Bertens to give me some disguises.
I'll be here by six A. M. to-morrow, by rail, or cart, or cab, or somehow, though every Bencher in the Temple say "No" to it.
Hang the proprieties—confound the etiquette! There's a prize here I'd stake my life for, were it only half as beautiful and good as I think it is."

III.

At eight o'clock on the following morning old James the gardener came up to his master, who was taking a turn round the garden before breakfast, and said:

"Please, Sir, I've got a hand as I think can do the garden-work you were speaking of last night."

"Indeed, James; and who is he?"

"Well, Sir, I picked him up by chance through Tom Groves, who keeps the Holly Inn. He says he's out of work, and knows something about gardening, and is quite agreeable about wages—his a week, Sir, with his bed and meals. I think you said that would be the agreement, Sir, and there's the bed above the stable, where the coachman slept before he was married. He's a likely enough lad, though he has a bit of black plaster on his face about half the size of my thumb; and is fair-spoken, too. He's an Irishman, and speaks very strong that way. Would you like to see him, Sir?"

"No, I think not, James. Or stay; you had better let me see him. Send him round, James."

James stopped back a few paces, and beckoned with his hand, upon which a figure came swinging round the corner of the villa, dressed in workman's overclothes, a rather dirty shirt-striped shirt, and a pair of thick, coarsely-made boots. He carried his brown velvet cap in one hand, a spade in the other, and had a spade in his hand. He had the appearance of being very much sunburnt, wore his rather dusty-looking hair over his face a good deal, and had a large piece of plaster across one cheek. Notwithstanding this last, the general expression was very taking, especially when he slightly doffed as he touched his cap, and, with a decided Irish accent, wished Mr. Raymond "Good morning, Sir."

"Good morning," said Mr. Raymond. "My gardener tells me you've done this kind of work before. Where did you do it?"

"Now for it," said Fred to himself. "I must tell a story, so here goes. In Ireland, Sir."

"Have you just come over from there?"

"No, Sir. I've got a friend in London, and came over from Ireland three weeks ago to make my fortune, and I've been doing odd jobs ever since—just what I could get, Sir."

"Have you a character you can show me?"

"Not I, Sir. Sure the character of a poor man like myself isn't worth paintin' on clane white paper. But I've always tried to get honest work, Sir, ever since I left my ould father's cabin in Connemara; and I'll do your work well, Sir, and honestly, if your honor will give me a fair trial."

"What's your name?" asked Mr. Raymond.

Fred had somehow omitted to settle this little point, and was accordingly obliged to give the first Irish name which occurred to him on the spur of the moment. The name which happened first to occur to him was that of an old fellow-soldier of his father's,
and how a kind friend to Fred himself. So he answered, with only a moment's hesitation:

"Fred O'Melley, your honor."

"Well, Fred," said Mr. Raymond, who had rather taken a liking to the pleasant good-humored countenance of the pseudo-Irishman, "we'll give you a trial. But remember, no rows or drinking. Do your work quietly and well, and we'll get on very well together, I daresay. Go into the kitchen, and have some breakfast before you begin work."

"Thank you, your honor," said Fred, as he walked off, and thought to himself, "If ever I felt in a cold perspiration in my life, it's been within the last ten minutes. I'm glad it's over, and so well over too. He's a fine genial old fellow. I've no doubt we would get on well together in any capacity.
Just to think I may be that man's son-in-law some day!—After this, too," thought Fred, looking down at his workman's dress and discolored hands. "But I'm going too fast, too fast, as usual. I've everything to do yet."

Thus reflecting, Fred marched off with his new friend, James the gardener, to partake of his first meal in the villa. At he did he be passed the dining-room window, and with a rapid glance he caught sight of Miss Raymond at the breakfast-table, waiting for her father. Her eye caught his for an instant, and the next Fred was out of sight, but with such a beating of the heart that he imagined she might even hear it, it was so loud.

"I'll defy her to recognize me in this state, though," said Fred to himself. "Travers didn't when I stopped him in the Temple, and asked him the way to his own rooms.
So I think I'm safe."

All that day Fred was busy at work in the garden, and gave James the utmost satisfaction. Mr. Raymond came outside from frequently during the day, to give directions and consult about the proposed alterations;
but of Miss Raymond Fred only once got a sight, and that was at a distance as she crossed the front lawn.

"By Jove," said Fred that night, as he tumbled into his cozy little bed over the stable, "I never was so glad to get between the sheets in my life. What with the mental anxiety and the bodily fatigue, I'm sure I could sleep a fortnight. Well, I think I have done a good day's work. Thank heaven, I've escaped discovery so far. Now,

IV.

On the following day the two gardeners got through a good deal of work, and Fred's healthy muscles responded heartily to the unusual strain put upon them. But though hours passed, never once did Miss Raymond indicate, by her presence, that she was interested in the changes going on in the garden. Fred, however, kept his ears open, and gathered a good deal from his fellow-servants of his fair mistress' character. Not one had a fault to find with her; and even cook, in her most excited moments, had nothing but praises for "Miss Esther."

That evening after dinner, Esther, who had been very much occupied indeed all day, came out to take her usual saunter, and, after a few turns in the lawn, went round to the back of the villa to see what changes had taken place in the garden.

"Why, papa, look there," she said to Mr.
Raymond, who was seated in the summerhouse beside a small table, on which he was wont to have placed his pint of after-dinner port. "There's that Irishman of yours working still."

"Is he at it still?" said Mr. Raymond.

"He seems an energetic fellow; and with some taste, too. He asked leave to try his hand at arranging these rockeries himself;
and if the thing turns out as well as he made it appear when he spoke of it, I expect a success. By the way, it's most extraordinary how well that fellow sometimes expresses himself. I can't understand it."

"I'll go and see what he's doing with the rockeries," said Esther, "for I've a pet project of my own about them."

"Very well, dear," replied her father.

Esther walked round the house, and approached the spot where Fred was busy among the stones of the rockery. He saw her coming, and continued his work busily, merely touching his cap to her when she came up to him, and not daring to raise his eyes.

"Mr. Raymond tells me you are going to make a pretty rockery of your own planning," said Esther, encouragingly and kindly.

"Yes, Miss; I'm sorr' to try, if you please."

"I think we shall require some larger and better stones than these," said Esther, at least to carry out the plan I have in my mind about them. What is your idea?"

"Well, Miss, I wouldn't have four of them.
I'd have them all into one, and it would be a different shape; not like a big sugar-loaf but spread out like, fainin' the house, and raised in the middle, and fallin' away at the sides to two small towers. I'd have all the flowers in bands, very thick at the bottom, for a foot or two up, and gettin' thinner, so as to show the rough water-stones, more and more, as we get to the top."

Esther started with surprise. It was her own plan. She had, when talking of gardening to Redestone, at the well-remembered dinner-party, explained it fully to him. But how could this man know of it? He could not have hit upon the same idea so exactly by chance. So she asked:

"How came you to think of this?"

"Well, ma'am, it isn't say thinkin' at all.
I was doin' an odd job down at the gardens
by the river side in London, where the lawyers live, and one of them, ma'am, was walkin through the gardens one day I was there, and he comes up to the gardener there and said to him—says he, 'Why don't you have a few rockeries here, Roberts?' And he draws the thing out on the gravel with his stick, and describes it, as well as I can remember, just as I've told you, ma'am. He was very particular about it, and was wishin' Roberts very much to try it."

As Fred spoke this story, (which was of course, a pure invention,) he still kept working with the stones; but he had told it with an object, and so, pretending to go round to the other side of the heap of stones, he allowed himself one momentary glance at Esther's face, and that showed him the black, which his tale had raised, dying away on Esther's cheek, and a half-checked smile of pleasure lingering about her lips.

"Heaven bless her bright face!" said Fred to himself when he saw it; and, taking up the heaviest stone near him, he sent it flying away into the near corner of the garden, among the stones he had rejected as unfit—not because this particular stone deserved rejection, but because he was in such a state of excitement that he felt he must have some outlet for his feelings. It was no slight or trivial pleasure to him to find himself so remembered by her.

"I ax your pardon, ma'am," said Fred. "I thought I saw one of them water-rats among the stones; but I've missed him. If you please, do you think the rockery will be da-cent at all?"

"Oh, yes. I think it will do very well," said Esther, as she walked slowly to another part of the garden. Just at that moment she was not at all inclined for conversation with her gardener, or any one else, and preferred to hide the companionship of her own thoughts and reflections. What she had just heard about a young lawyer suggesting her plan to the Temple gardener required both solitude and reflection.

"It must have been he," she said to herself; "he has at least remembered my plan.
Why should he wish to have it in the Temple Gardens? Perhaps he liked it so much; he said he did. And yet—and yet——" And she scarce finished the thought in her mind, but allowed herself to fall into a dreamy state of wonder and vague indefinite pleasure.

V.

Next morning, after breakfast, when Fred was preparing to resume his garden duties, Bertha, Miss Raymond's lady's maid, came tripping up to him with an open letter in her hand.

"Look here, Mr. Frederick," said she, holding up the letter. "Did you ever see pink paper before, scented far sweeter than all your flowers put together?"

"No," replied Fred; "it's beautiful! Who sent you that, Miss Bertha?"

"Then's for me at all, it's for Miss.
She's going out to a great dinner-party tomorrow, up in London, and this is the invitation, with a coat-of-arms on it in green and gold. She's given it to me, because she knows I keep all the nice things she gets.
Here! She takes the bouquet of flowers we take with her to the dinner. You won't for get, Sir, will you?" and Bertha shook the letter at his face.

"Going to a dinner in London," thought Fred. "I wish I knew where!" But he only answered, quietly, "I'll not forget, Miss Bertha; and I'll gather one for you too —quite as pretty, if you'll let me. I know one flower that would look very pretty in your black hair."

"Go along, Sir," said Bertha. "But you may bring it, and let me see it; and maybe, if you behave yourself, I'll accept it."

"I suppose she's going to dine with the Lord Mayor!" said Fred, fishing.

"No, you silly goose. The idea! She's going to dine in ——— square, with some people of your outlandish name—a Gen.
O'Melley.

"A dinner to-morrow at Gen. O'Melley's," thought Fred, as soon as she had gone.
"Good heavens! There surely can't be two Gen. O'Melleys. It must be my poor father's old fellow-soldier.
It is, by St. Patrick, I'll be there!" "I'll risk it," he said. "I'll send a telegram on the chance, and a letter, and a messenger, if I can get one, into the bargain. I haven't seen them for two years. I had forgotten they were coming over from Dublin for a week or two of the London season. To think of meeting her on equal terms again.
There is some hope in that, for though this gardening work has given me an opportunity of knowing her real character, it doesn't seem likely to do more. So I'm off to Berrow, and we'll see what can be done at O'Melleys." So Fred, after obtaining the exact address of the O'Melleys from Bertha, made an excuse to go down to the village that forenoon, and sent off his dispatches with a beating heart.

As he was sauntering back by the river side, he suddenly heard a scream from some one farther down the bank, and, on rushing past the intervening bushes, he saw Miss Raymond standing about twenty yards off close to the edge of the river, with her hands clasped together, a look of agony on her face, and her eyes strained and fixed on the current of the river where it swept past the adjoining promontory.

"What is the matter?" inquired Fred, as he bounded to her side.

"Ruby!" she said. "It's Ruby drowning!
He has gone too far out, and his strength is gone, and he is drowning!—My poor Ruby!"

The next moment Fred was in the stream, striking out with a long, full stroke to where poor Ruby was struggling, and sinking every now and then, and being carried round and round like a cork. Fred was a powerful and practiced swimmer, and he shaped his course swiftly toward the drowning dog.

"Oh! he turns—he's down!" cried Esther, as Fred sank again, and the along to thing! it was nearly drowned yesterday, and would have been, had not our under-gardener plunged into the Thames and saved it."

"Do you know what he did with your reward?" said Fred, in a low tone, and with a peculiar smile. As he spoke he put his hand to his breast, and showed, just for a moment, the piece of gold which Esther had given him attached to a silk ribbon, and suspended from his neck.

Esther started as if she had received a great shock, and turned as pale as death.
Then she forced the trembling words out almost in a whisper, scarcely knowing what she said:

"Mr. Redestone, what does this mean?"

"Esther!" said her father, now coming up in a hurry. "The horses have been waiting half an hour, and we cannot keep them a moment longer. Come, dear, we must go."

Fred offered his arm to Miss Raymond to lead her to her carriage, and when they had reached the hall, and while Mr. Raymond, who had forgotten something, ran upstairs to fetch it, Fred spoke:

"You asked me, now, what my Ruby's this token meant, Miss Raymond. It means that there is a man, even in this hard century, who has done a thing of which he is half ashamed, but which he shall never regret; who would count all toil pleasure if for the sake of the woman he loved, and who would risk his life—not once, and for gold, but ever, and freely—to gain and to keep her dear heart. Miss Raymond," continued Redestone, hurriedly, as he heard Mr. Raymond returning downstairs, "I have scarcely a right to speak this to you. I have no right to ask a reply now. But I trust you will forgive me my foolishness and my rashness, and perhaps answer me gently some day—even if it should not be as I wish."

Redestone's passionate words had been so hurried, and her father had joined them so immediately after they were spoken, that Esther could not possibly have answered them even had she thought it right to do so. But her poor heart was beating very fast, and her little hand trembled very much upon Fred's arm as he led her to the carriage. When she shook hands with him she did manage to say the words "Good night," and Fred's whole face was lit up with a glad joy as he noted that it was not in unkind or offended tones that she spoke the words.

"Good night, Mr. Redestone," said Mr.
Raymond, as they were driving off; "don't forget Saturday!"

VII.

At three o'clock on the afternoon of the appointed Saturday, Fred pulled the great bell of Mr. Raymond's villa, and entered the grounds by the gateway through which he had last passed, dressed in the garments of a servant of the establishment.

"It's very odd," said Fred to himself, with a smile, as he passed through the garden, and saw James busy among the flower-pots.
"It's a very odd sensation being received by one's fellow-servants with such respect and deference. I don't think that fellow would touch his hat so respectfully if he could recognize me."

But the next instant he was met by Mr.
Raymond, who shook him by the hand, and gave him a most cordial welcome. "My daughter is indoors, Mr. Redestone," he said, "and will be glad to welcome you presently. Pray step in. Down, Ruby—down, Sir! Why, Mr. Redestone, that dog seems to know you."

"Nice dog," said Fred, carelessly, as he patted Ruby, and stepped into the villa.

"It was all but drowned the other day," said Mr. Raymond; "and had it not been for an Irish fellow, who worked in the garden here, jumping in after it and saving it, we should have lost poor Ruby. A most extraordinary fellow, that Irishman, by the way! He was engaged here for a week; and the other night, when we came home from the O'Melleys, we found he had levanted before his time had expired, and, strange to say, without taking away any of our goods and chattels with him, as I at first feared was likely. He left a note for me, begging pardon, explaining that he was obliged to leave for some outlandish reason, and requesting that his wages might be given to the head gardener. I never heard of such a thing."

Fred bit his lip, to keep in the almost irresistible laugh, and then rose to shake hands with Miss Raymond, who now entered the room.

Poor Esther was in a dreadful state of confusion, and her face got red and white by turns, in spite of herself. However, as they almost immediately went in to lunch, her duties as hostess occupied her, and helped her a good deal. After lunch Mr. Raymond asked Fred to go out with him to the garden, and inspect the flowers. "My daughter," he said, "will join us after she writes one or two letters which I wish sent off at once."
So Esther was left in the house, and the two gentlemen went out into the garden.

"Now or never," thought Fred: "I must not lose this opportunity."

"Mr. Raymond," he said, aloud, "I have come down here, on your kind invitation, to see your beautiful villa and grounds; but my main object was a very much more serious one—to ask your permission to propose for the hand of your daughter."

"It must be admitted that Fred had the knack of going very directly to the point; and so Mr. Raymond thought, as he answered:

"You do surprise me, Mr. Redestone, very much indeed; for though, to tell you the truth, my old friend O'Melley gave me a hint that something of that kind was going on, I never dreamt of anything so precipitate as this."

Then Fred pressed his suit long and urgently, and appealed to Mr. Raymond more eloquently and more powerfully than ever he had done, or could do, to a jury. It would have required very strong objections, and a very stubborn heart, successfully to resist his earnest pleadings. There was no doubting the honest look in that flushed and handsome face, and the genuine feeling ringing in those words Mr. Raymond felt his objections gradually being overthrown in spite of all he could say, not by Fred's arguments, but simply by the force and power of his passion, as it shone in his eyes and sounded in his tones. He had quite taken a liking for Fred the first time they met, and the liking had increased each time he saw him. His kingly and genial heart was touched as he listened to Redestone so eagerly urging his suit; and at last he fairly gave way, and thus answered Fred's appeal:

"Though I have known you for so short a time, Mr. Redestone, yet, to speak frankly, I know all about you, and your family and position, both from Gen. O'Melley and from others; and, while I think a little time for you to know each other would be advantageous, yet I do not forbid you to address my daughter as you desire."

Fred was most profuse in his thanks, and fairly won Mr. Raymond's heart by the way in which he expressed his gratitude.

Very soon after, Esther joined the two gentlemen in the lawn. Mr. Raymond, true to his promise, made some excuse, and, greatly to the consternation of Esther, left her alone with Fred. Redestone saw that she was agitated, and knew, too, that his time might be limited; so he made a bold plunge into his position without preface.

"Miss Raymond," he said, "you know what I feel toward you. You must think me bold as well as foolish, but I trust to your generosity and forgiveness. I have sought your father's permission to address you as you know I wish, and he has consented. I now come to you with my humble request for your hand. I know I am unworthy. I can scarce believe that I dare hope, but I am urged on by a love which will not be stayed. I seek from you, I beg of you what is far more dear to my heart than all the honors I may win, and then every happiness shall be all mine."

As Esther listened to these words, her face was very pale. Very different feelings were struggling and contending within her heart;
for words she could not but feel glad to be wooed so ardently, yet could she say that she really loved him? Did she really know her own heart in the matter? Could she think of promising to wed this impetuous lover, on so short a knowledge of him?
He had proved the truth of his affection by braving the risks and the shame of discovery and ridicule, at few men would have dared to do. Yes, she thought, he might have restrained was his wild impetuous nature for a time, before he asked me for an answer so suddenly, and so readily." Her manifestly pride was offended, and came to her assistance; and though her face was very white and her extraction fixed and formal, she answered slowly and with dignity, and with strange coldness in her tones:

"Mr. Redestone, I cannot but be flattered by what you have said; but is it right that you should speak so rashly to one you know so slightly, and who has become acquainted with you only so very recently?
You must pardon me if I say that you do not sufficiently consider your own position, or what is due to the person whoever she may be—whom you so address."

The words had scarcely passed her lips when she felt how cruel they were—how, in their strict and stern justice, they ignored utterly all the little palliations of poor Fred's case. She thought how freely and generously—even if rashly, and so far in-considerately toward her—he had given her his whole love, his proved affection, and now he had treated to her not piercing the heart he had laid bare with words of coldness and of selfish pride. She had not even uttered one word of kindness, or gentle pity, to soften the bitterness of his pain.

Fred's face fell, and he walked slowly on beside Miss Raymond with all the folly of his rashness and inconsiderateness fully disclosed to his mind. He felt that he ought to have thought of this sooner. He felt that his passion had carried him too far and too fast, and that he had been shamefully blinded to what was due to the woman he loved.
So, in a low and trembling and sorrowful voice, he spoke his regret and apology:

"Miss Raymond, you are right—as I believe you ever are and must be. I humbly seek your pardon for my rude and hasty love. It is true I do not need to know you more, for I know well the nature and goodness of the prize I seek to win. But I wrongly thought that, in my words and acts, you might have seen enough to judge me, and thinking that, and loving you so dearly, I could scarcely bear to live and not know my fate!"

There was such a look of pain in Fred's face and a tone of such agony in his voice, that every word cut Esther to the heart. She could not bear to think that it was her words of merciless self-assertion which produced this pain. She was right enough in what she had said, if she had only said it more gently and kindly. And after all she did love him. She knew it now, at this instant, while he was speaking to her—clearly and surely, as she had never known or acknowledged it to herself before; and as her heart melted with pain at his sorrow the tears rose in her eyes.

Redestone stopped suddenly before her,
his eyes now lit up with new hopes, as he said to her:

"You do pity me, then, Miss Raymond, and I would fain hope you may some day learn to love me. Do not still call me bold and rude, but let me take this hand, to guard and to keep till you say no may again. Do not think unworthily of me, but trust my heart to love you faithfully until it beats no more upon this earth."

Esther had covered her face, and tried to hide her tears with her handkerchief, when he stayed her on the gravel walk; and as he took her hand gently in his own, she did not take it back from him, but allowed him to press it ardently to his heart, and to his lips. "Need more be said?" Esther's hand was given, and her heart pledged; and with the Summer sun shining down upon these two bright figures by the river side, the earlier falls upon the final scene of the last act of "Fred Redestone's Escapade."—Temple Bar.

SUITABLE DRESSES.—As for dresses suitable to certain persons, I need say but little.
There are many books on the etiquette of dress, showing what is proper to be worn in the morning and in the evening and at noonday. A few very simple rules will suffice here. Those who are very stout should wear nothing but black; those who are very thin should put a little padding in their gowns;
and neither should be in the least décolleté.
Perpendicular stripes in dresses give height and increase fullness, and are therefore particularly suited to very slight, small people, and particularly unfitted for stout figures.
To fair persons blue is becoming—but not every blue. Dark blue, or too brilliant a blue, is extremely unbecoming to that kind of complexion, and makes the skin yellow and the hair sandy. It is the old pale, dull blue that really makes sand gold. Pink, especially the old-fashioned yellow pink, is, when not too brilliant, becoming to all complexions except that, which goes with red hair. Light green may be safely worn by the very dark, the very rosy, and by the very pale when the skin is extremely clear; but to ordinary English faces it is a trying color, though there are people who look well in nothing else. Green, mixed properly with pale blue, is very becoming indeed. Gray is the most beautiful color for old and young—I mean the soft silver gray which is formed by equal parts of black and white, with no touch of mauve in it. It admits of any color in trimming, and throws up the bloom of the skin. Rose-color, for some people, is pretty, and not unbecoming.
White, so disastrous to some, is generally becoming in dress, only very coarse complexions are spoilt by it.

Short women should never wear double skirts or tunics—they decrease the height;
so much, unless, indeed, the tunic is very short and the skirt very long. So also do large, sprawling patterns used for trimmings. Let these be left to women tall enough to carry them off. Neither let a very little woman wear her hair half down her back; let her lift it clean up as high as possible.—Saint Paul's Magazine.

AN ANECDOTE OF SIR GEORGE LEWIS.— Doubtless Sir George Lewis rode his hobby too hard, and, but for his devotion to study, his useful life would probably have been prolonged. Whether in or out of office, he read, wrote, and studied. He relinquished the editorship of the Edinburgh Review to become chancellor of the exchequer; and when no longer occupied in preparing budgets, he proceeded to copy out a mass of Greek manuscripts at the British Museum. He took particular delight in pursuing any difficult inquiry in classical antiquity. One of the odd subjects with which he occupied himself was an examination into the truth of reported cases of longevity, which, according to his custom, he doubted or disbelieved.
This subject was uppermost in his mind while pursuing his canvass of Herefordshire in 1865. On applying to a voter one day for his support, he was just as decided a pes-timist. "I am sorry," was the candidate's reply, "that you can't give me your vote;
but perhaps you can tell me whether any body in your parish has died at an extraordinary age?"—*From "Character," by Samuel

FRUIT-GROWING IN SOUTHERN CALIFOR-NIA.—Avenues of walnuts, or olives, or oranges receive us, and the water at each side of the drive runs merrily along with the nimble feet of our horses. Little streams run down between the rows of trees, and lose themselves in the distance, where they flash up occasionally among bushes and flowers. The house is shaded by tall eucalyptus and wide-spreading pepper trees, and out of the front door, standing under the veranda, we can look down a broad drive, shaded by magnificent orange trees. It is the Orange-avenue of the place, and besides adding a most attractive feature to it, and furnishing a shady promenade at most all hours of the day, it yields a princely income to the owner. There are acres upon acres covered with these trees, and pomegranates, almonds, peaches, apricots, &c. Of grapes there are 150 acres, but the grapes from which the 19,000 gallons brandy and 70,000 gallons wine were made on this place last year, did not all grow on this land; the product of about 400 acres more was bought up for this purpose. Not is the whole of this product consumed in California, a large amount being shipped to the Eastern States.
The Sunny Slope cellars are extensive, and the distilling apparatus I should like to describe, if I only knew how. But I learned something about wine, too, standing among the great hogsheads and casks and barrels filled with this fluid, namely, that it requires a far greater quantity of grapes to make Port wine than it does to make Angelica or White wine.

And now, in conclusion, let me impart what I myself learned of fruit-growing in tropical California. I repeat only figures and results that have been attained and achieved, year after year, in this part of our State. The harvest has always been a sure one—safe and secure as any we can expect to reap, "while yet the day lasts, and night cometh not."

Oranges, lemons and limes, raised from the seed, will bear in their fifth or fourth year. The profit on these, oranges particlarly, is larger than on any other fruit, paying at the rate of from $50 to $50 a tree, while ornamental trees are counted by the score. They need constant irrigation, and the fuller they bear the more water do they drink. The trees can be transplanted at almost any age, without injury; but trees over three years old are seldom to be found at the nurseries. Next in profit come walnuts, yielding an income of from $300 to $1,000 per acre, and requiring irrigation only in the uplands; in the valleys they grow well without.—The Overland Monthly.

A PLEA FOR TOLERANCE.—A large and varied survey of the miseries of mankind has led me to conclude that every man is a thing much to be pitied. One cannot be angry with men, or be otherwise than tolerant of all their errors and shortcomings when one thinks that most men have teeth —that some men shave—that we have to get up and go to bed (both of them detestable operations) every day—that there is hardly any place, however remote, in which there is not more than one delivery of letters in the course of the twenty-four hours—that any human being, however foolish, can annoy any other human being, however sensible (though thousands of miles should separate them,) by informing him abruptly, in a brutal telegram, of all the unpleasant things that can happen—that pleasures are taken in such large doses as to become rather like poisons, dinners lasting sometimes three hours—that we have to live with creatures, very like and yet very unlike ourselves, who are strangely attractive to us, and whom we fondly and vainly endeavor to manage (they every day in these times becoming more unmanageable)—that children will scream at the top of their voices and wear out shoes in the most reckless manner—that most of our abodes are but vertical continuations of sewers—that there is no good weather anywhere; it is always too hot, or too cold, or too rainy, or too shiny, or too misty, or too dazzling—that old ladies will have the windows up in a railway carriage when the wind is south, and young ladies the windows down when the wind is east—that there is such a thing as public speaking, and that no one can say or write anything with reasonable brevity—I say again that a male human being is a creature whom one cannot regard but with the utmost pity, and even his slight aberrations from perfect virtue are results which may naturally be expected to follow from the adverse circumstances that surround him.—

FAIRY RINGS.—Every one who is accustomed to the country knows a "fairy ring" when he sees it. Each ring is only a belt of grass of a much darker green than that surrounding it. In a paper on "The Fairy Rings of Pastures," read by Prof. WRAY before the British Association, at Southampton, in 1846, it was stated that the grass of which such rings are formed is always the first to vegetate in the Spring, and keeps the lead of the ordinary grass of the pastures till the period of cutting. If the grass of these "fairy rings" be examined in the Spring and early Summer, it will be found to conceal a number of agarics or "toadstools" of various sizes. They are found situated either entirely on the outside of the ring, or on the outer border of the grass which composes it. DECANDOLLE's theory, that the rings increased by the excretions of the funguses being favorable for the growth of grass, but injurious to their own subsequent development on the same spot, was remarked on, and proved to be in sufficient to explain the phenomena. A chemical examination was made of some funguses—the true St. George's agaric of Linnæus, agaricus gravesiens—which grew in the "fairy rings" on the meadow around the College at Cirencester. They contain 87.65 per cent. of water, and 12.35 per cent. of dry matter. The abundance of phosphoric acid and potash found in the ashes of these specimens was most remarkable, showing 20.49 of the former, and 55.10 of the latter. The Professor's view of the formation of these "fairy rings" was as follows: "A fungus is developed on a single spot of ground, sheds its seed, and dies. On the spot where it grew it leaves a valuable manuring of phosphoric acid and alkalies, some magnesia, and a little sulphate of lime.
Another fungus might undoubtedly grow on the same spot again; but, on the death of the first, the ground becomes occupied by a vigorous crop of grass, rising, like a phœnix, from its ashes." Dr. WOLLAS-TON and Sir HUMPHREY DAVY both adopted this elucidation of Prof.
WRAY's as the correct one; and his
is the explanation most generally accepted by the best naturalists. The theory has also been very clearly stated in an early volume of the London Medical and Physical Journal, thus: "Every fungus exhausts the ground on which it grows, so that no other can exist on the same spot. It sheds its seed around; and on the second year, instead of a single fungus as a centre, a number arise in an extensive ring around the spot where the individual stood. These exhaust the ground on which they have come to perfection; and in the succeeding year the ring becomes larger, from the same principle of divergency."—Once a Week.

EDUCATION OF WOMEN.—Speaking generally, the training and discipline that are most suitable for the one sex in early life are also the most suitable for the other; and the education and culture that fit the mind of the man will prove equally wholesome for the woman. Indeed, all the arguments which have yet been advanced, in favor of the higher education of men plead equally strongly in favor of the higher education of women. In all the departments of home, intelligence will add to woman's usefulness and efficiency. It will give her thought and foresthought, enable her to anticipate and provide for the contingencies of life, suggest improved methods of management, and give her strength in every way. In disciplined mental power she will find a stronger and safer protection against deception and imposture than in mere innocent and unsuspecting ignorance; in moral and religious culture she will secure sources of influence more powerful and enduring than in physical attractions; and in due self-reliance and self-dependence she will discover the truest sources of domestic comfort and happiness.

But while the mind and character of women ought to be cultivated with a view to their own well-being, they ought not the less to be educated liberally with a view to the happiness of others. Men themselves cannot be sound in mind or morals if women be the reverse; and if, as we hold to be the case, the moral condition of a people mainly depends upon the education of the home, then the education of women is to be regarded as a matter of national importance. Not only does the moral character but the mental strength of man find its best safeguard and support in the moral purity and mental enlightenment of woman; but the more completely the powers of both are developed, the more harmonious and well-ordered will society be—the more safe and certain its elevation and advancement.

But while it is certain that the character of a nation will be elevated by the enlightenment and refinement of woman, it is much more than doubtful whether any advantage is to be derived from her entering into competition with man in the rough work of business and politics. Women can no more do men's special work in the world than men can do women's. And wherever woman has been withdrawn from her home and family to enter upon other work, the result has been socially disastrous. Indeed, the efforts of some of the best philanthropists have of late years been devoted to withdrawing women from toiling alongside of men in collieries, factories, nail-shops, and brickyards.

There is, however, one special department of woman's work demanding the earnest attention of all true female reformers, though it is one which has hitherto been unaccountably neglected. We mean the better economizing and preparation of human food, the waste of which at present, for want of the most ordinary culinary knowledge, is little short of scandalous. If that man is to be regarded as a benefactor of his species who makes two blades of corn to grow where only one grew before, so less is she to be regarded as a public benefactor who economizes and turns to the best practical account the food-products of human skill and labor. The improved use of even our existing supply would be equivalent to an immediate extension of the cultivable acreage of our country—not to speak of the increase in healthy economy, and domestic comfort. Were our female reformers only to turn their energies in this direction with effect, they would cure the greatness of all humanitarians, and be accounted as sinners the greatest of all practical philanthropists.—From Character, by Samuel Smiles.

DRESSING' HUMOUR.—The humour of our good friends, seems, when we begin to analyze it, a very simple matter—merely the knack, as we have before said, of seeing crooked—of posing every figure into oddity. A tone, a gesture, a look, the merest trait, is sufficient; nay, so all-sufficient does the trait become that it absorbs the entire individuality; so that Mr. Toots becomes a Cheshire, Mr. Tulrydrop incarnate Deportment, Uriah Heep a Cringe; so that Newman Noggs cracks his finger-knuckles, and Carker shows his teeth, whenever they appear; so that Traddles is to our memory a Forelock forever sticking bolt upright, and Ragsid (in Little Dorrit) an incarnate Hook-nose and Moustache eternally meeting each other. Enter Dr. Blimber: "The Doctor's walk was stately, and calculated to impress the juvenile mind with solemn feelings. It was a sort of march; but when the Doctor put out his right foot, he gravely turned upon his axis, with a semicircular sweep toward the left; and when he put out his left foot, he turned in the same manner toward the right. So that he seemed, at every stride he took, to look about him as though he were saying, 'Can anybody have the goodness to indicate any subject, in any direction, on which I am uninformed?'" Enter Mr. Flintwinch: "His neck was so twisted that the knotted ends of his white cravat actually dangled under one ear; his natural acerbity and energy always contending with a second nature of habitual repression, gave his features a swollen and suffused look; and altogether he had a weird appearance of having hanged himself at one time or other, and of having gone about ever since, halter and all, exactly as some timely hand had cut him down." This first impression never fades or changes as long as we see the figure in question.

Akin to this perception of oddity, and allied with it, is the perception of the inconsistent. Never did the brain of human creature see stranger resemblances, funnier connections, more side-splitting discrepancies. This man was for all the world like (what should he say?) a pump, the more so as his feelings generally ran to water. That man was a spider, such a comical spider—"horny-skinned, two-legged money-rotting, who spun webs to catch unwary flies, and retired into holes until they were entrapped." Yonder lips the immaculate Pecksniff, "carolling as he goes, so sweetly and with so much innocence, that he only wanted feathers and wings to be a bird."

Here, as elsewhere, the whole power lies in the incongruity of the whole comparison. In the reader's perfect knowledge that Peckniff is a humbug and an impostor, and that there is nothing bird-like or innocent in his nature. The vein once struck, there was nothing to hinder our good Genie from working it for ever. His path swarmed with oddities and incongruities; Warner-like he mixed these together, and produced the Homunculus, Laughter. And just as the perception of oddity and incongruity vexes a man, varies the enjoyment of Humour. Quoddity for quoddity, the reader gives as well as receives; and if the faculty is in him, he will turn away contemptuously. A weasel looking out of a hole is enough to convulse some people with laughter; they see a dozen odd resemblances. Other people, again, walk through all this topsy-turvy land with scarcely a smile. Life in all its phases, great and small, seems perfectly congruous and ship-shape; much too serious a matter for any levity.—St. Paul's Magazine.

PIKE-FISHING IN NORFOLK.—Norfolk is the paradise of the pike. We may read in the newspapers of his growing to an enormous size in some solitary fish-pond, where, for aught we know, and if the stories of his longevity be true, he may have reigned supreme since the days when the pre-Elizabethan monks placed him there as a young pickerel. But nowhere does the average size of pike equal their condition in the Norfolk rivers and broads. There you find them in all ages and sizes—from the three-inch jack just trying his "prentice han'" upon equally juvenile roach and dace, to the still-growing elderly individuals over three feet long. Their number is legion; and Norfolk pike-fishing, in my estimation, beats both front and salmon-fishing for right-down good sport. If you are inclined to be sentimental, and to subscribe to Mr. FREEMAN's views about hunting, you have the satisfaction of knowing, when pike-fishing, that you have not lured your herbivorous creatures to their destruction, but simply caught the carnivorous cannibal that intended to do unto others what you intend to do unto him. Of course, abundant though this tyrant of the fresh water is in the places I have mentioned, there are times and seasons when you may try your luck, and try it in vain. You must consider time and tide, in the most literal sense, if you desire to be successful. An easterly wind will not only keep the pike, but every other fish, quiet at the bottom, or nestling in the reeds. A few days of rain will muddy the water, and thus prevent the pike from seeing a bait, even if it were not hunted by the electric jarks. Then, as regards the tide, it is an important item to be studied in Norfolk pike-fishing. I have mentioned how flat the country is in the "broad district"—so flat that rivers have not a fall of many inches in scores of miles. The consequence is, that an unusual tide—as when the north-westerly gales have been blowing—will find its way up the rivers, broads, and dykes, turning the water brackish, and either driving the more delicate fish before it, or turning them up sick and dying. The pike, as well as the roach, is very susceptible of salt water, and, burly though he be, cannot stand it at all; while the bream and the perch seem to revel in it, if it be not over saline. These periodical salt-water inundations, I have no hesitation in saying, destroy more pike than anything else. If you go up the "lanes" leading from the rivers to the broads—so called because cut out of the tall stems of the Arundo phragmites, the grass used for thatching—you will see some, if not hundreds, of pike turtled up and floating on either side. How many find their way into the thickets of tall reeds and grasses, I cannot say; but, considering that a greater portion of the watery area is covered by these, than is left uncovered, I should say the same number seeking shelter or driven there must be immense. And yet these periodical thinnings do not seem to have lessened the fish. The multiplication of dykes has given them increased facilities for spawning; while there need be little fear of their not obtaining food sufficient and to spare, as long as the waters yield such quantities of roach, dace, bream and eels.—Belgravia.

THE BAY OF SAN FRANCISCO.—On nearing San Francisco, one is impressed with the reality of approaching a great commercial mart. Ships, with flowing sails, and bearing the flags of many nations, are seen speeding on their course for that natural beacon, the South Farallon, or the picturesque headland of Punta de los Reyes; while others, outward bound, are plunging through the rough, breaking waves, as they ply against the adverse wind with the ebbing tide. The boats of coasters, too, of every rig and size, with their sails lustily spread, fly over the water like flocks of sea-gulls on the wing; and mammoth steamers, hurrying to and from every quarter of the globe. And if it be night, this thoroughfare to the metropolis is illuminated, from its remotest landmark to the centre of its magnificent haven. Or, if misty haze envelop the coast, the shrill fog-whistles of Año Nuevo, Pigeon Point, Del Reyes, Farallon, with the "syren" on Point Bonito, and the trumpet of Point Lobos, warn and direct the anxious mariner. Thick weather is often met with; and at such times every visible object becomes at once of unusual interest, and a stranger might well be in doubt as to the nationality of the port he is nearing (if he judge from objects immediately about him) as frequently the first craft seen is an Italian fishing-boat, with its lateen sail, or a Chinese boy, half savage, half junk, with its oriental rig and celestial crew, who still adhere to their hereditary mode of navigating. There is a grandeur in the scenery about the approaches to the Golden Gate, commensurate with the vast resources of wealth within its portal. To the left are the Pavilions, a cluster of fantastically formed rocks, the habitat of which appears to be a cathedral-like mountain spur, from which summit flashes the vivid light that casts its rays for miles seaward, mingling with those of its other continuous fellows. THE BRIBERY INQUIRY.

The Examination of Witnesses Resumed Yesterday—The Stipulation Clause—Mr. Hammond's Connection with the Company—The Miller Life Bill.

The Miller investigation was resumed yesterday by the Legislative Committee, Mr. Tonry presiding.

Mr. HENRY W. JOHNSON requested to be allowed to correct his statement of Friday in one particular. He had been under the impression that the $2,000 paid to Mr. HAMMOND had been paid with a check of the Company. He had since found that he gave his own check for the amount to Mr. HAMMOND on May 13, 1871, which was some weeks after the examination had been concluded.

In answer to questions from Mr. TONRY, Mr. JOHNSON said she check had been drawn on the Corn Exchange Bank to the order of Mr. HAMMOND. The witness was general attorney and counsel for the Knickerbocker Life Insurance Company, had attended the examination, and took notes of the testimony. The examination was continued at different times, and occupied several days. The witness had thought it necessary to have counsel, but he declined to state why he employed Mr. HAMMOND.

Mr. TONRY asked if there were any questions of law arising during the examination, which question Mr. JOHNSON declined to answer. Mr. TONRY further asked if the witness had ever consulted Mr. HAMMOND on questions of law, and this the witness also declined to answer, adding that he declined answering on the ground that he had some doubts as to the question of privilege. If he had read the resolution under which the Committee were acting, he might then be able to determine how far he ought to answer such questions.

A copy of the resolution was produced, after reading which Mr. JOHNSON said he did not think the Committee was authorized to inquire into the opinions of witnesses, or as to what they did with regard to counsel. The examination of this witness was therefore discontinued.

COMMODORE VANDERBILT'S CHECK.

DARIUS R. MARGAM, President of the National Trust Company, was next placed on the stand. The witness said that he knew nothing of a check being drawn in blank by the Commonwealth Fire Insurance Company on the National Trust Company; he knew the officers of the Company, and understood that the Company kept an account at that bank.

Mr. MILLER here said that he had been assured by the Committee that both Mr. HAWES and Mr. FOWLER would have been produced as witnesses, and he had certainly expected they would be here to testify on the subject.

Mr. MARGAM said he had never paid any checks drawn by the Company; he was present at a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Commonwealth Fire Insurance Company when they passed the resolution for certain extensive repairs; these were two meetings, at the first of which Mr. MILLER opposed the motion; the last meeting was DARIUS R. DOUGHTY, the Secretary say——

Mr. MILLER said he was opposed to this kind of evidence, as to what others had said; he objected to this hearsay kind of evidence, when witnesses were to be had; why not produce the witnesses themselves? He had been subjected to abuse on all sorts of hearsay evidence, and he thought it was time that some protection should be had against such wild calumny.

Mr. TONRY asked the witness if Mr. HAWES or Mr. FOWLER were in the City, and was answered in the affirmative. The witness then left.

At the request of the Chairman, the clerk gave the addresses of these gentlemen, and the examination was discontinued.

THE MILLER LIFE BILL.

THEODORE R. WEYMOUTH, Vice-President of the Security Life Insurance Company, was then called. He said, in answer to Mr. BARNES, that he had been Vice-President of the Company since 1861; he had paid the usual charge of one-fifth of one per cent. upon the transfer of securities deposited with the Insurance Department at Albany; he placed in evidence the invoice of such transfer, showing the fee to be $200 on the transfer of $100,000 of stock, and internal charges $2 50; the was paid by check. Mr. BARNES then asked if the Company had subscribed for the Miller bill, to secure the passage of the Miller Life bill. The witness said a subscription has had been presented by Mr. LAWRENCE in the Spring of 1871, and he had been asked to subscribe to it; the bill was a mere memorandum, and the sum required was $20,000, of which the Security Insurance Company was asked to subscribe $1,500; he had paid a check for that amount, drawn to the order of Mr. LAWRENCE; he understood the money was used, as was the money subscribed for what was known as the Miller Life bill; the names of the Security Insurance Company was the last on the list, upon which were the following: Mutual, $2,000; Equitable, $3,500; New York, $3,500; Knickerbocker, $3,000; United States, $3,000; Continental, $2,500, and Security, $1,500. He understood that the other corporations were in favor of the bill as by it could be ascertained what was to be done, and what the companies were liable to; the principal features of the bill were received with favor; the witness had not studied the amendments as they were offered it in Committee; he had no knowledge of the names being added after the signature of the Security Insurance Company had been put on the list; he understood at the time that the other companies had paid their subscriptions, and thus the amount asked for was all that was needed; the witness had had some doubts about the bill, and had thought it might be imposed upon, and that the other subscribers had not paid the amount affixed to their names.

In reply to Mr. MILLER, the witness said he knew nothing of him, MILLER, in the transaction, except so far as the conversation with Mr. LAWRENCE was concerned. He had been requested to take up the document to be used in the passage of the bill; but Mr. LAWRENCE did not say how it was to be used. Mr. LAWRENCE had the list with the name of the Security Insurance Company for $1,500, and the witness paid the amount with a check to LAWRENCE's order. The bill was a long one, the subject of considerable discussion. The law, as it previously stood, was scattered and uncertain, and it was generally thought that the new bill would be an improvement. Nothing was said how the money was to be used. Mr. LAWRENCE was a Republican, and President of the Continental Life Insurance Company. The witness did not know where LAWRENCE could be found, at present. He had heard, about two weeks ago, that LAWRENCE had gone out of the City. The bill did not become law. The witness had signed a document addressed to Mr. MILLER, and knew what it was. He had never received either threat or inducement from Mr. MILLER on the subject, and had never paid him any money.

THE ANNUABLE SURVAE LIFE.

JAMES F. R. HADDEN of New-Jersey, Secretary of the Annuable Survae Life Insurance Company, was next called and examined by Mr. TONRY. He had been Secretary of the Company since the organization on March 17th, 1869; the affairs of the Company were examined into on March 17th, 1871, by Messrs. SOUTHWICK and COLBRIDGE, under the direction of Mr. MILLER; the investigation occupied two or three days; they had all the books and papers before them; they knew of the deposit at Albany, and went through the statements of accounts and the ledgers; about fifteen or sixteen hours were consumed in the work during the two or three days; Mr. KEYDALL, the Vice-President, paid $250 for the work in the office; the work could not be done in less time; counsel was not employed, and the examination was not made at the request of the Company.

In reply to Mr. BARNES, the witness said the gross assets of the Company were over $200,000; being over $100,000 above the deposits at Albany; the amount connected with the deposit at Albany had been in United States stock; the examination was deemed expedient, but was not made at the request of the Company; $400 had been paid on account of transfer of stock, at the rate of one-fifth of one per cent.; there had been four transfers, of $50,000 from United States stock to bonds and mortgages; Mr. MILLER had been paid the $400 in person, by check, with $6 extra for notorial fees; there had been no bill presented; a letter had been received from the Insurance Department for the first $200, but not for the other; the bonds and mortgages had been received from the Commonwealth Fire Insurance Company, of which WILLIAM M. TWEED, Jr., had been appointed receiver; WILLIAM M. TWEED, Sr., held $20,000 worth of stock in the Annuable Survae Insurance Company. The Company paid nine-tenths of the value of the bonds and mortgages. The witness thought the titles had been examined into, as the bill of SEWELL & PEARCE for such examination had been paid. He thought the property had been appraised by Mr. TIFFANY, but did not recollect who was his associate. The witness thought he could produce the receipts for the examination and appraisement. The Annuable Insurance Company were reinsuring their risks with the Guardian Mutual Life Insurance Company, and the business was there in progress. Mr. KEYDALL was formerly Secretary of the Great Western Insurance Company.

In reply to Mr. MILLER, the witness said the fees for examining the bonds and mortgages were paid to lawyers outside the Insurance Department, and was entirely a matter of arrangement.

THE COMMONWEALTH CHECK AGAIN.

HENRY R. SHEPP, clerk for the Receiver of the Commonwealth Fire Insurance Company, was called and examined by Mr. BARNES. He has heard of the report about a $1,000 check having been issued in blank, but had not found the check. He had found other checks belonging to the Company. (He produced the stub check-book, showing that a check, No. 627, for $1,000, had been issued on the Commercial National Bank under date of Nov. 11, 1870, for $1,000, but that arrangements had been made on that part of the stub which should contain the name of the payee and the purpose for which it was drawn.) He had searched for the check, but could not find it. The checks should be in the hands of the Cashier, WILLIAM O. COOPER, and the Receiver had taken to the checks, as well as the vouchers, [illegible]

CASTLE GARDEN.

The Investigation Continued Yesterday—Testimony of Commissioner Williams, Mr. Barr, Mr. Levon, Andreas Willman and Other Witnesses.

The Subcommittee of the Assembly Committee on Commerce and Navigation, Messrs. DEMOREST, JUDD, GRIS and CHAMBERS, resumed their inquiries into the affairs of the Commissioners of Emigration at 10 A. M., yesterday, at Castle Garden, with Mr. BENNETT in the Chair. RICHARD O'GORMAN, the President of the Commissioners, said that he called a meeting of the Board to give the Committee an opportunity of summoning them as witnesses.

GEORGE W. DALY was the first called, and said: He was a store-keeper, and a United States detective officer at Castle Garden; had observed the manner in which the emigrants have been imposed upon; in 1868 they were charged ten cents for a loaf of bread weighing three ounces less than what it ought to have weighed. The witness said he had reported to Mr. CASSELLY impositions practiced on Swedish emigrants, and no attention has been paid to his complaints; it was a common case, he said, for emigrants to be induced to sell their gold at 90 when the quoted price in town was 106; Mr. CASSELLY would never heed complaints. The witness, in answer to the Chairman, said he had not been inside Castle Garden before for six years, and knew nothing of the abuses that now exist in the Emigration Bureau; if the Institution is conducted now as it was five years ago, there is no department of it that leaks rotten.

ANDREAS WILLMAN, a member of the Emigration Commission, a hotel-keeper at Sharon Springs, and Collector of Internal Revenue; Was satisfied with the present management of the Commission; sometimes overcharges for provisions to emigrants were made, but were always rectified; prices for meat, which was supplied by special contract, were excessive; certain officers got the best place, and he complained on the sale of railroad tickets to emigrants; witness, as a friend to the Germans, was satisfied that the German emigrant was fairly treated; this Board was equally divided as a political body.

Mr. WILLIAM R. BARR, an agent of the Erie Railroad, and for the Emigration Commission since May, 1870: Thought that his appointment might harmonize the differences that might occur between the Erie Railroad and the Emigration Bureau. Three railroads are in competition for the transportation of emigrants, the charges are all alike; Erie allows a commission of ten cents to the runners or runners for agents, to the steam-ship companies, and the agents; the emigrant buys the ticket himself; is not allowed the ten cent; the other railroads allow the same percentage. Speaking of the rates of charge on the Erie Road, the witness said: Our rate for emigrant baggage is 10 per 100 pounds; Central Pacific charges 40 cents to a first-class passenger to allow 100 pounds of baggage, to an emigrant eighty pounds, because the emigrant pays less fare; we allow 40 to 50 per hundred pounds for freight to Buffalo, and greater distance; it will be think that emigrant's baggage, as a rule, is more valuable, and requires more handling; the baggage handled by the three companies are the same.

Mr. WILLY WALLACE, a member of the Board of Emigration, placed on the list of Commissioners by the German Society, belongs to the Castle Garden Commission. In his testimony he stated he had granted relief to poor families in the City; he had charged the Tweed Ring with Ward's Island, but timely relief he may be enabled to get into a way of business and keep his family together; he was satisfied with the treatment emigrants receive, Kiss, a purchasing agent for Castle Garden, he did not consider any indemnities unnecessary; the prices charged for meals were too high; he understand that he was a relative of Wm. M. Tweed, and was anxious to get rid of him; was under the impression that there were too many officials in Castle Garden; not more than three or four places could have been dispensed with. Mr. CAMPBELL here stated that the rumor that KING was to be removed from the office of Mr. WALLACE spoke favorably of the Erie Railway, and expressed it as his opinion that the disposal of tickets should be left with the Commissioners. The constant competition between the agents of the three lines caused the chief abuse to which the emigrants are subjected, and the competition did not favor the Erie; the Erie would, without doubt, be lower; if the railroad companies would have confidence in the Commissioners, and allow them to furnish the emigrants tickets, the tickets could be sold cheaper and with less inconvenience to the emigrants; there were many removals from office during the first six months of his holding the position of Commissioner, and the new officers were principally appointed by Mr. FREIN; about $1,000 of the money of the Company; through the hand of the Exchange broker, during the year; Dr. KISSAM was removed for political reasons; Dr. BETZEL was appointed in his place, and removed on account of incompetence; not professional incompetence, but from inability to speak and write English sufficiently well to be understood; the Commissioners, at their meeting, thought the very extravagant sum paid commission would be of greater benefit to the emigrants; the Commissioners could then give more time to their duty, and could dispense with many of the officials; a paid commission of five ought to receive a salary of $10,000 per annum; Mr. JAMES LEVON, a member of the Board, here called and said: The Commissioners of Emigration, through Mr. E. P. BACON, bought boots and shoes from him for the emigrants; Mr. KING did not buy personally; the goods were sold at the lowest market price; on Sept. 1, 1871, he sold a case of ingrain carpet, thirty-five cents per yard, and they were accepted by KING as the Commissioners; at 81 cents, he sold one case of boots at 95 cents, which were sold as the Commissioners at $1 50; a case of women's boots, for which $100 was claimed, the Commissioners paid $1 20; a case of shoes at 60 cents a pair was sold to the Commissioners at $1 10; he sold goods at from twenty-five to fifty-five per cent. on the transactions with the Commissioners; witness collected the money from the Commissioners, and then paid KING, through BACON, the difference between the two prices. The witness was asked by Mr. O'GORMAN whether he did not consider it his duty to report such transactions to the Commissioners. The Chairman interrupted and said that it was not the witness' duty to teach the Commissioners their duty.

Mr. JOHN S. WILLIAMS, of the firm of WILLIAMS & GUION, said he paid the City Chamberlain $1 50 a head for passengers. This head money was raised to $2 50. The City paid this head money to the Company's profit. There was a sum of money collected from the steamship companies paid to a lawyer to get the head money reduced. The lawyer's name was NOLAN, and he got twenty-five per cent. from each company; the amount of money saved in one year by the reduction of the head money. This fund brings over about 30,000 passengers annually. Mr. NOLAN engineered the law for reducing the head money through the Legislature, on the plea that he represented to the Legislature that the reduction would increase the number of emigrants and reduce passage fares. The fares have not been reduced in consequence. This reduction was made during the last Legislature. The total number of emigrants arriving in the port of New-York last year was 320,000, so that the saving in the head money is $229,000, out of which Mr. NOLAN is supposed to receive twenty-five per cent. The head money ought to be reduced still further. The Commissioners have been of service to the emigrants, but still they have spent far too much money in their management. It would be desirable to have a representative of one of the steam-ship lines in the Commission of Emigration.

Mr. LEONARD R. WELLS, the Warden of Ward's Island testified that he inspected all the articles and goods that come on the Island; when Mr. KING was purchaser, he observed that the price of articles increased; the quality of boots and shoes were very inferior; Mr. IRVING always had the contract for furnishing the meat; he has the contract now; he charges 18 cents per pound for soup meat, eight cents for roasting beef, and nine cents for mutton, which is lower than the tariff of last year; a great advantage would be derived by the Commissioners not allowing emigrants who have been any time in the country to return to Ward's Island. Kings place all the paraesses; the sick emigrant ought to be cared for five years, but a strong and healthy person ought not be cared for by the Commissioners for more than two years.

Mr. ROBERT NEUMANN, a chaplain in Castle Garden daily for seven years, thought everything in the Emigration Department has evinced improvement.

Mr. THOMAS CAHANY, a livery-stable keeper, said he had a contract to remove the emigrants and their baggage at forty cents per piece, regardless of size or weight (near the Garden) up to Fifteenth-street; Senator NORTON was interested with him in this business, which amounts to about $20,000 collected directly from the emigrants themselves; seven or eight thousand dollars a year profit is made thus; Senator NORTON left my business because there was not enough profit in it.

Mr. RICHARD O'GORMAN testified that he considered the affairs of the institution much improved since the appointment of the new Board; not heard complaints, but always found the Board ready to adjust them; when he advocated the reduction of the head money he thought that one ship-owner was interested; he certainly knew nothing about NOLAN; did not think that the Federal Government could manage this institution any better. It is said that no emigrant can get his baggage without paying ten cents; no such rule exists now; it was abolished in 1868; last year there was a reserve fund of $80,000, which the Legislature authorized the payment and other expenses had greatly reduced; the head money does not now pay for the support of the emigrant; about $100,000 of the reserve fund had been exhausted in the support of the emigrants.

JOHN COONAN, Chief Clerk of the Landing Bureau, said that there are certain number of boarding-house-keepers allowed in the Garden who have to give an account of the number of people they are supplied; if emigrants complain against them, they are not allowed to enter the MILITARY GOSSIP.

In the case of Capt. Bird W. Spencer, Company E, Ninth Regiment, accused of cowardice at the July riots, it appears that the evidence, as adduced before the Court, does not appear to warrant a reasonable belief that Capt. Spencer could be convicted of the charges preferred if brought to a trial before a court-martial, but, on the contrary, clearly shows that he did receive a wound, from the effects of which, as Dr. Colville testifies, he has not yet fully recovered. Lieut. Col. Dunn, of the Eighth Regiment, President of the Court, recommends that the charges against Capt. Spencer be dismissed, and Gen. Varian has accordingly restored the accused to his command.

As a sequel to the acquittal of Capt. Bird, of the Ninth Regiment, the members of Company K have requested Lieut. H. P. Bacon, his accuser, to resign his position and leave the Regiment.

Extensive preparations are being made at Providence, R. I., for a reunion of the artillery officers of the Army of the Potomac in this City, on Wednesday, the 6th inst. The meeting will be held in the rooms of the Marine Artillery, at 12, Meridian. A large number of officers from different States have signified their intention of being present, including Generals Hunt, Barry, and Ledlie, Colonel Greene, Major Monk and Captain John M. Howell. The President of the Society of the Artillery of the Army of the Potomac, General Charles Ewing, has been unremitting in his efforts to render the present reunion entirely successful.

Col. Krzyzanowski, of the Ninety-sixth Regiment, has been discharged from the service.

Col. Henry Wilson, one of the oldest, if not, indeed, the very oldest, of the retired officers of the Army, Commander of the Department of New Orleans, Col. Wilson first entered the army in the year 1812, and was engaged actively in service until his resignation at the commencement of the late war between the States. His first service was with Gen. Jackson in Florida, and he participated in the Black Hawk war and the Seminole war. He distinguished himself in the Mexican war by his more than once brevetted for gallant and meritorious conduct, and on the taking of Vera Cruz was appointed by Gen. Scott Military Governor of the city. He was then Lieutenant-Colonel of the First Infantry, but subsequently became Colonel of Seventh Infantry, which rank he held at the breaking out of the late war. He then resigned his commission, which, on the recommendation of Gen. Scott, was promptly accepted. For nearly fifty years he had been in the military service of the country, and his fidelity with which he discharged his duty is shown by the fact that, during the whole time he had never had a charge of any kind preferred against him.

The Ninth Massachusetts Regiment are already making preparations for their visit to New-York next Summer. The estimable will come by the Old Colony and Newport, and return by the Stonington Line. It is proposed to make stops early at Providence and New-Haven on their return. It is expected Gilmore's Band will be engaged for the trip. The intention seems to be to make the trip one week long, and during the early part of June next.

In the Forty-seventh Regiment of Williamsburg, Major R. R. Rogers has been promoted to Lieutenant-Colonel. He has been a member of the regiment since its organization, and has always devoted himself with enthusiasm to forward its interests. He has passed through every subordinate grade and possesses all the qualifications for the command to which he has been elected. Capt. A. C. Dunn, of Company E, Thirteenth Regiment, succeeds Col. Rogers, as Major of the Forty-seventh. His election, as in the former case, was unanimous. Lieut. Dunn is a private of U Company, Forty-seventh Regiment. He subsequently removed to the Western District and joined the Twenty-third Regiment. Subsequently he attached himself to the Thirteenth Regiment and raised Company I, of which he took command.

Both branches of the Maine Legislature, on Wednesday unanimously elected Ex-Gov. Chamberlain as Major-General of militia. Senator Spaulding, of Sagadahoc, explained that this was desired by the officers of Bowdoin College, to aid them in perfecting their plans for affording military instruction in that College.

It is reported that the Sixty-fourth Regiment, Irish Fusiliers, from Malta, will relieve the Sixty-first Regiment, now in garrison at Halifax.

Capt. Robert M. Dysart, of Lebanon, Tenn., while on a visit to this City, was taken sick and died on the 25th inst.; illness resulting from wound received in action in the late rebellion. Capt. Dysart was born in Lancaster, Penn., Jan. 26, 1841, entered the Union Army Oct. 8, 1861, as a First Lieutenant Company I, Seventy-sixth Pennsylvania Volunteers, Col. Hambright; afterward promoted for gallantry in action to Captaincy Company C, same regiment, and served as Aide-de-Camp on staff of Army of the Cumberland, with whom he remained until the close of the war; was wounded twice.

The Ninth Massachusetts Regiment, of Boston, has been rather inactive of late time past, but the general prospect of the regiment is excellent. Condition evinced by the advent of Sergeant-Capt. J. O. Davenport, of Company G, Eighth Regiment, has won the medal offered to the member securing the highest number of recruits.

A court-martial will convene at the armory, Boston, at 10 o'clock P. M., for the trial of Lieutenant non-commissioned officers and privates of the Ninth Regiment. Sergeant Perry is detailed as President of the court-martial; Lieutenant Sergt. McNab, Commissary-Sergt. Hoxie and Hospital-Steward Rogers are to report to Major Perley for duty at the court-martial.

Fires in this City—Report of the Fire Marshal.

At 3½ o'clock yesterday morning, a fire occurred in a rear room on the top floor of the frame building, No. 136 Clinton-place, occupied as a dwelling by EDWARD MULLIGAN, causing $2,000 loss to furniture, &c.; insured for $3,800. The second floor of the building is occupied by JOHN LINDAM, as a club-room; damage by water $1,000, no insurance. The first floor is occupied by FELIX LAIRIN as a liquor-store; damage by water $1,000, no insurance. The fire extended to the adjoining building, No. 138 Clinton-place, occupied by E. SANDKUHL, merchant tailor, whose stock, furniture, &c., were damaged to the extent of $300 by water. The building is owned by GEO. W. WOODWARD, and is damaged to the amount of $2,000. Mr. MULLIGAN was sick in bed and unable to leave, and when the fire broke out was carried out of the burning building in blankets by his friends.

Shortly after 7 o'clock yesterday morning, BERNARD GATLEMAN, an employe at the straw-hat factory of AARON FACON, lighted a bunch of straw and entered the basement to examine the boiler. While there he accidentally set fire to some loose straw, and before the flames could be extinguished, damage to the extent of $600 was sustained; insured.

At 11 o'clock yesterday morning, a fire broke out in the ceiling of the second floor of the extensive building owned by the Robbins & Appleton American Watch Company, No. 1 Bond-street, which is occupied by the watch company and a large number of manufacturing jewelers and watchmakers. The fire was first discovered in the ceiling of a room occupied by CARTER, HAWKES & DOWS, and spread to the floors above on the third floor, occupied by MULFORD & Co., and J. E. ROBERTS & Co., thence through the partitions, into the hall of the third floor. The firemen, under Chief-Engineer FARRAT and Engineer BATES, succeeded in extinguishing the flames in a very short time. The damage to the stock and fixtures of MULFORD & Co., CARTER, HAWKES & DOWS, and J. E. ROBERTS & Co. will not exceed $500. The building is damaged to the extent of $2,000, and is fully insured. The fire is supposed to have originated from the stoves, heating apparatus, and an investigation is being made by Fire-Marshal MORGNOR.

Fire-Marshal MORGNOR reports 118 fires for the last month, 32 of which occurred in dwellings, 4 in grocery stores, 2 in stables, 4 in paint-shops, 2 in screw and planing mills, and the remaining 74 in other buildings and places. The total loss is estimated at $97,000, of which $21,300 was on buildings and $75,700 on contents. The amount of uninsured loss was $80,500, about equally divided between buildings and their contents, and being 83 per cent. of the total loss. Amount of insurance on buildings $272,800, and on chattels $1,000,000, making a total of over $1,272,800. Among the fires reported, one was the produce still, remain premises, seventeen fire-rooms occupied by business offices, 1 hoist-hooded stoves, furnaces, stove-pipes, &c., 19 by foul chimneys or overheated chimneys, 4 by defective heating apparatus, 27 by careless use of lights, matches, &c., 2 by spontaneous combustion of chemicals, 1 by spontaneous combustion of oil, 1 by sparks from locomotive, 1 by incendiary origin; 6 not yet ascertained, and the remainder originated from a variety of supposed accidental causes.

THE PENAL TOMBS.

The site of the Tombs, in Centre-street, is in the midst of a dull unenviable locality, for permanent possession of which a very even struggle is maintained by vice and commerce. It is the last place in the world where the lounger would afford in search of recreation. Fronting nearly the severe monotony of dirty brick houses until you come to the Tombs building. The exterior of the Tombs is by no means inviting, and in fact, if it had been the desire of the architect to erect something that should strike terror into the hearts of offenders he could scarcely have designed a building more suitable for that purpose than the present one. Its monumental breeds contempt, and the seven granite columns whose strange capitals seem to frown upon the audacious ones that mount the broad steps are now a chosen lounging place for the very class which furnishes most victims to its chambers of law. Perhaps there may be some fascination in the hieroglyphs and the mystic cornices that adorn its friezes and its architraves. The winged globe with the serpent twining round it may have some odic power by which those who have passed under its portals must come again and again until friendly Death steps in and takes them away from their degradation, to begin life again in other spheres and under happier auspices. It certainly is a fact that the high priests of this temple of Justice, the Police Magistrates, are before them continually the same faces.

In Winter time the early morning business of the Tombs commences at 8½ or 9 o'clock. At about that hour, yesterday, the reporter of the TIMES made his visit to the place. The Justice had not yet arrived, but the seats provided for the public were already fully occupied, those in front by policemen waiting to give account of their captives, those behind by idlers, who apparently had nothing else to do. The majority of these chewed tobacco with much perseverance, but some brought their breakfast with them and ate it with perfect appetite and sang-froid. Opposite to these seats were the dais and row of desks provided for the Justice and his clerks, fortified by a perfect labyrinth of railing. On the right hand of this the place of honor was the place of shame, the corner railed off for the prisoners. This was partitioned to separate males, females and children, fairly filled, though the Chief Clerk, who was very affable and communicative, spoke of it as a dull morning, and said that Sunday was the time to see the room in its full glory. Four-fifths of the occupants of the dock in the corner were up for intoxication, somewhere in mean cases by the side of their wives, and there were as many drunken women as men. But there was a marked difference between the two. One-third of the men in dirty for this offence were respectable. Some had handsome overcoats all stained and filthy, some had sand, and others had silk shawls, elegant dresses, and some were as coarse as any workmen. The well-dressed ones seemed to realize the shame of the position, and leaned against the railing with their heads down, turning their backs upon their comrades in misery. The women sat patiently in the background, acting particularly ladylike, and looking very ashamed at the dock.

But with the women there was not one who could be classed as second. Upon all the brand of vice had made a deep imprint, searing the flesh and giving it diabolical colors and twists. They were all arrested either for being intoxicated or for some offence. Horrible as they looked, they were not the worst. They are in many instances, even better days. The affable Clerk said that many of them had been the petted inmates of fashionable resorts of the metropolis, caressed and flattered by the jeunesse dorée of the City, jeweled and fingered by spendthrift gamblers and prodigal Tammanyites. Step by step they come down until in about eight years they make the tour of the Tombs, and wind up in the death-rattle in a penitentiary hospital. On the downward road the wheels are greased for the first three or four years by champagne, and they make their appearance only occasionally in the court of the winged globe. But the glass and the dice of Stock and Gambling give place speedily to the long, gloomy reign of whisky, under whose tyranny their visits to the Tombs become more and more frequent until they become old regulars.

It is painful to read the names upon the roll—the pet, caressing names, Minnie Smith, Fanny Burns—and to see the horrible, bloated, blotted, discolored faces, and the forms clad in squalid rags, that answer to them. They seem to have little feeling about the matter; they chatter unconstrainedly in their dismal cage, and open heavily upon a stranger in a well-dressed, well-looking prisoners among the men. The great joke appears to be to cry "waiter;" then the man gives imaginary orders for all sorts of delicacies. And the women chime in with, "Waiter, don't forget a glass of sweetened gin, my stomach's delicate this morning." It is a ludicrous sight to see the appreciation of the joke, save one well-dressed young fellow, leaning over the railing, while overcoat in one mass of stains from mud and vomit, who looks round at them with a savage frown as if he would like to knock their heads together. It is important that the Sheriff's officers, apparently at home and in their element, whatever he is not in his. So their laughter increases, and they converse ever more brilliantly, becoming, in truth, somewhat obscene. When this point is reached, the officer in charge of the cage interferes. He says, "Come, now, don't you think people have had enough of this? Don't you think not? A low-browed vicious-looking Irishman says, 'Sure, ain't we in the right to keep up our spirits?' and a woman adds, "I'ye want to go pray; I'd sooner pray nor think any day." "That's enough," responds the minion of Justice, and the cage is cleared of the last remnant of whispered conversation, which is interrupted by the arrival of the Magistrate. Hats are immediately taken off, and the policemen jump to their feet. The doors of the cage open and the unhappy ones defile through the lines for railing in front. Rhadamanthus, The policeman, their company with the advent of Sunday for whom they are personally responsible. Before, however, they meet their fate, Rhadamanthus catches sight of the respectable prisoners and beckons them. The officers who have arrested their whispers the facts in a low tone, Rhadamanthus smiles. He looks at the young fellow and says, "Young man, I know a man by name. But but if you'll take my advice, you'll let whisky alone." He replies, "I will, Judge; whisky will never taste to me now as it did before I saw that crowd. There's enough there to sicken a man for life as far as drinking is concerned." Rhadamanthus nods, without reply, and the young man is discharged in double quick order. The other respectables, including the workmen, are dismissed with the same kind determination, and then the work begins. Each policeman's name is called in order, according to the districts, and his batch of unfortunates are huddled in front of the dock. He points them out with his finger and states what each charge was with which they are severally charged. The Clerk presents corresponding documents for committal, and the Justice sentences the offender. In fifteen minutes the entire crowd is disposed of and the cage is empty.

Two Revenue Officers Arrested on a Charge of Black-Mailing.

G. N. LAWRENCE and FLOYD FIELDS, two keepers under the Deputy Collector of this District, were charged before Commissioner OSBORN, yesterday, with extorting money from FRANCIS GOTTERBERGER, of No. 164 West-st., under a threat of seizing his place for alleged violation of the Internal Revenue laws. It appears that GOTTERBERGER's store was seized by the Deputy Collector some time ago, and the accused put in charge. The matter was settled, and the men withdrawn. A few days ago they went to GOTTERBERGER and told him that he was still liable to seizure, but that the matter could be settled. GOTTERBERGER offered $50. They demanded $100, and he gave them a check, made payable to order, for that amount. When the they went off. Meantime GOTTERBERGER stopped payment of the check, and procured a war

The New-York Times.

The New-York Times,
DAILY, WEEKLY AND SEMI-WEEKLY.

This journal is now thoroughly identified with the greatest political necessity of the hour—unremitting warfare against all forms of corruption, whether in national or local government. For years past the TIMES has been exposing the demoralizing influence of self-interested politicians, and its resolute warfare upon the Tammany Democracy has been received with universal approval. It has adhered to the pledge given in its original prospectus, more than twenty years ago, that the public should be truly represented, and their interests faithfully guarded through its columns. Its record has been pure and honorable, and the highest aim of its proprietors is to render it more and more worthy of its past history, and of the confidence which the public repose in it. Two out of three of the original proprietors still direct its policy, and guide it on all public questions. They purpose that the TIMES shall continue to keep clear of all narrow and unworthy influences and aliances, and aim to represent the great body of the public, as distinguished from personal factions. It occupies a perfectly independent position, and is free to speak the truth on all subjects and shame all men. Its greatly increased circulation throughout the country, adds to its power and influence. It will continue to be a faithful exponent of Republican principles, and advocate, with unfailing energy every design which tends to further the welfare of the people.

This utmost care will be devoted to gathering political news from special sources during the Presidential canvass. This department of the paper will be unusually full and trustworthy. Renewed enterprise will be exhibited in every department of the paper, and large space will be devoted to reports of speeches made during elections, or on other important political occasions.

A very full summary of news, and many general articles of great interest, are published in the Semi-Weekly editions; and in the Weekly edition there is an unabridged report of the proceedings at the Farmers' Club, an excellent summary of political information, and a great variety of matter suitable for family reading.

The NEW-YORK TIMES is pre-eminently a family paper, all objectionable advertisements being rigidly excluded; and it has a constantly increasing circulation among the most respectable classes of the community.

Let every man who has a well-grounded complaint to make in regard to the administration of justice in this City, go before the Judiciary Committee whose sittings begin to-morrow, and tell all he knows. The Committee is here to find out the truth in regard to the charges of corruption and personal favoritism made against our local Judges. Let not the people who can substantiate these charges hang back now. Public welfare and private morals have a very heavy stake in the conviction of our unjust Judges, and the man who can assist in bringing this about, is guilty of a flagrant neglect of duty, if he fails to do so.

The Administrative Provisions of the New Charter.

The opponents of the Committee of Seventy's charter are trying very hard to create an impression in the public mind that its provisions relating to heads of Departments will prove, in practice, both cumbrous and expensive. Strong pressure will undoubtedly be brought upon the State Senate to induce such a modification of the measure as will tend to re-establish the "one-man power," of whose efficacy the Tammany régime furnished us with so beautiful an illustration. The charter is based on the minority principle, and it carries the principle out into the organization of Executive Departments. The expediency of this requires very little illustration. It would be inconsistent with the minority principle to vest the appointment of heads of Departments in the Mayor, because the Mayor only represents a simple majority of the voters, and may be assumed to be bound by real or implied pledges to the leaders of this majority, in making his appointments. To allow him to appoint the heads of Departments, would be to give the majority an unqualified supremacy in the Executive Departments of the City which the charter denies to them in the Legislative Department. To vest the appointment of the chief officials of the City in the majority of the Board of Aldermen would perpetuate the same anomaly under a form almost as objectionable. The minority have a claim to be represented in the conduct of public business intrusted to the various Departments. It is, therefore, an inevitable consequence of the fundamental principle of the charter, that there should be more than one responsible head of every Department, so that a minority in the Board of Aldermen representing a minority among the voters, should have the chance of putting in their representative among those intrusted with the administrative conduct of public business.

If this principle of minority representation is to yield the fruits which we are entitled to expect from it, there can be no valid objection against paying out a few extra salaries for the purpose of giving it a fair trial. How ruinously expensive the "one man power" is liable to become we have learned to our cost. But even the slender objection of increasing working expenses cannot apply to the administrative details of the new charter. On the contrary, they can be much more economically worked than those of the existing charter. For example, there are seven of the present City Departments which, under the provisions of the new charter, will be reduced within the compass of three. These are Finance, Public Works, Docks, Police, Health, Fire, and Buildings. Under the Seventy's charter the Department of Public Works absorbs the Department of Docks, and that of Public Safety is intended to discharge the functions now divided between the departments of Police, Health, Fire, and Buildings. Beginning with the Department of Finance, it would seem as if the substitution of the Controller plus four Commissioners, for the Controller only, involved a sacrifice of money in order to procure organic symmetry. When we find however that these Commissioners are to perform the duties at present performed by the Commissioners of Taxes, at a cost of some $30,000 a year, that the fee of $40,000 paid to the Chamberlain for signing the checks for the State tax is to go into the public treasury, and that the office of Chamberlain, with its enormous fees of at least $60,000 a year, is to be abolished, we find that the City can afford to pay the Commissioners of the Treasury very liberally, and yet be considerably the gainer. Then, as to the Commissioners of Public Safety; suppose that all six were paid $10,000 each—total, $60,000 a year—the amount would contrast very favorably with the following sums, now paid for performing the same duties: Four Police Commissioners, $60,000; five Fire Commissioners, $25,000; four Health Commissioners, $30,000; Superintendent of Buildings, $7,500; total, $112,500 a year. Then again, five Commissioners of Public Works could be readily paid out of the $7,500 a year received by the present head of the Department, added to the $25,000 a year enjoyed by the five Dock Commissioners, whose duties merge [illegible] Department. Of the saving to be expected from putting a stop to the scandalous "jobs" of this highly important office, we do not speak, though it forms by far the largest element in the calculation. It will thus be seen that even a very superficial examination of the administrative details of the new charter is sufficient to show how delusive are the objections brought against them under an assumed plea of economy.

How Best to Reform our State Charities.

Many of our readers will remember that some three or four years since a very vivid statement was made by the Secretary of the State Commissioners of Charity, Dr. HOYT, of the horrible condition of our country poor-houses. The revelations contained in that report produced at once a powerful effect throughout the State, and the Legislature as well as the local authorities immediately set about reforming these dens of abuses. The Commission has the legal power of inspecting all the charitable institutions of the State which receive any State aid. Its field of work may be judged from the figures contained in its Fourth Annual Report, just issued.

There are under its supervision 240 institutions of charity, of which the State institutions alone, such as asylums for lunatics, the blind, the deaf and dumb, the idiots and inebriates and the like, own real estate to the amount of $4,451,450, and personal property to the value of $4,830,070. The receipts of these asylums during the past year from public moneys amounted to the respectable sum of $835,925, and their expenditures were $1,302,339.

In the poor-houses under their inspection there were expended during 1871, for paupers, $1,187,400. Among the orphan asylums and homes of the friendless, which they supervise, there were appropriated $499,750, of which sum the largest share—$50,000—was bestowed upon the New-York Roman Catholic "Protectory." The hospitals of the State also received $300,000, and the dispensaries $68,400. The property held by the orphan asylums and "homes" under their inspection, amounted to the large sum of $8,415,770; while their annual expenditures were $2,309,491, and the whole number of persons supported in them amounted to 21,479. The whole number treated in the hospitals was 10,785, and in the dispensaries it reached 284,047. These dry figures show the enormous and important field of work of the Commission.

All our readers interested in the wise management of charities will share our regret that a Commission having such a vast and important field of operations, and numbering among them men of such experience in the science and practice of charities as Prof. DWIGHT and Dr. HOYT, should possess nothing but an advisory power. They can inspect and report—that is all. If they find a country poor-house, filled with abuses which are a disgrace to our humanity and civilization, all they can do is to "report;" if they discover a City charity which is obtaining its funds on false pretences, they can merely mention the fact in their annual statement to the Legislature; but we all know how much effect annual reports have on that body. Probably not one member in fifty ever reads such documents.

Now the subject of the proper management of these numerous State charities, and of all charitable institutions depending on State aid, is a matter of the highest importance to the public. There should be unity and science in our State administration of the interests of the poor and unfortunate. There ought to be a power or central board which should not only expose, but correct abuses; and which could carry out the most advanced principles of the science of charity. A great change is, for instance, at this time being inaugurated in the Poor Law administration of this State—a most happy change. The old abuses and evils which have so long cursed our rural management of the poor and unfortunate, are being remedied and reformed, by placing many of these unfortunates in State institutions, carefully managed and with proper classification. County care of paupers is giving way to State care, and the English system of local charge of paupers, which has existed since the times of HENRY VIII., is yielding to the modern system of more general congregation. The insane of the villages are to be placed in the State asylums, the able-bodied vagrants in State work-houses, the blind and deaf and idiots of the counties are to be housed and cared for in large institutions adapted for them, instead of, as now, heading and mingling with all the local vagrants and prostitutes and paupers in the county alms-houses; and last and most important of all, the pauper children are to be taken out of those "seminaries of vice," county poor-houses, and to be cared for elsewhere. It is in precisely such matters of reform that the direction and authority of a State Board of experts are needed.

In the report we have quoted from, we observe that Dr. HOYT fully appreciates the advance which has been made in the science of charity during the last decade, and recommends—what has been found to be the great improvement in dealing with pauper and neglected children in all countries—the plan of "distribution," or placing in homes, followed so long and so successfully in this City by the Children's Aid Society, rather than congregating in asylums. Still, all who are familiar with rural overseers of the poor, know that they have an ignorant prejudice in favor of herding these unfortunate pauper children in large masses in public buildings, rather than putting them where they will at once share in American life, and escape all stamp of pauperism—in the individual farmers' homes. A State Board could alone overcome such ignorant prejudices, and remove the pauper children of the rural almshouses to separate homes rather than to vast asylums—perhaps opening some central place of shelter, which should be a mere agency of distribution.

For all these vital reforms in our pauper administration, the first necessity is a stronger legal authority in our State Board. They will never have a year in which it would be easier to secure such increased powers from the Legislature than this. They should at once set about obtaining from this Legislature an act prohibiting the Controller from paying out any appropriations to any charity of the State which had not received the formal and written approval of the State Board of Commissioners. This would at once give them all the authority necessary. And such is the high character of the Commissioners, that no one would fear to delegate it to them.

The time is evidently coming, if it has not already come, when men are to be counted, and prized, and rewarded, not for their power to domineer over this many, or for their skill in destroying life, but for their mastery of the arts that are useful and elevating, and which tend to bring the people together in the most civilizing and humane relations. It is remarkable that the strongest presentation of the labor question was made last year in Paris, by a great army who claimed new and extravagant privileges for working men, and who virtually repudiated their good cause by trying to make of labor an exclusive and oppressive caste, and to carry all the vices and tyranny of the old imperial purple into the new dynasty of the imperial blouse. Such excesses should lead us all the more to consider the lot and claims of the working classes, and try to do our part to meet the great problem between labor and capital.

We ought certainly to have a better idea than we have of the number and condition of our industrial classes. The census, indeed, shows the truth, but the census is a dull book and has no rhetoric, while fashion and pleasure flaunt their faces and fancies on every side with all the arts of embellishment and all the helps of society and the Press. It would be a great sight if all the trades and professions in this City could have a parade upon some great memorial day, perhaps the birthday of FRANKLIN or WASHINGTON. It would be good to have the professional men, the teachers, and the artists join in the procession, but they are better known already to the community, and the great thing would be to see the great army of industry, the people who do the useful work of the City and pile up its wealth, with little recognition of their dignity from the great world of ostentation. What a host they would be, probably not far from a quarter of a million of persons, men, women and children, all engaged in some useful art, and busy in the work of this great Metropolis.

It is not easy to carry out this conception of the forces of industry upon a grand national scale, and picture to ourselves the industrial companies, regiments, and divisions, with their various implements or armaments, that our America could call into the field, and to estimate exactly the figure that we might thus present in comparison with the other ruling nations of the world. No such host, surely, has ever been seen on earth as our gathered workmen from farms, work-shops, and factories would present. Take a single department of our new industry—we refer to our great and growing railroad interest and its operatives and officers—what a host of well-trained, thrifty and effective men come before us! Precisely how many they are, we have no exact returns at hand to show, but certainly our sixty thousand miles of railroad cannot employ much less than ten men to a mile, and so we have over half a million of men disciplined to serve punctually the steam-whistle, which waits as little upon our indolence as tide or time itself.

It is a great matter to classify our industrial forces and try to rate them duly in the scale of intelligence, energy, and responsibleness. We may have a glimpse of the true rule, if we are not able fully to carry it out. We can see that there is a great body of unskilled laborers who can bring little more than bone and muscle into the field, and do their plain day's work under an employer's eye; yet these men, especially in our country, are passing through a rapid transition, and learning to combine a certain skill and experience with their toil. Then comes the great and mighty host of skilled workmen, who are the power and wealth of the land, and who are constantly passing up from the rank and file of industry to places of importance and emolument. Then we have the labor that is combined with science, the great staff of engineers, architects, chemists, mineralogists, &c., who lead forth the army of industry.

It is plain that the future of nations is to depend upon the co-operation of labor with capital, and that the character and position of our workmen are having new importance in the thought and legislation of the world. Labor is feeling its importance as never before, and using social organization and the Press to quicken fellowfeeling and bring the whole working force of the countries into mutual understanding. We ought to be glad of this, and do what we can to teach true principles of co-operation, and show the madness of the communism that robs labor of its reward by destroying property itself, without which not a dollar is safe in the laborer's pocket, nor a shingle over his house, nor a potato in his field. Let our working people look each other in the face, compare notes with their companions in toil all over the world, and the social science of the race will be the better for this new public spirit and this new social science.

Capital has been first in the field with its own kind of cosmopolitan largeness. The money of the world understands itself pretty well, and the wealth of Europe and America feels one pulse beat like the twins of Siam. Evil may come from temporary and unscrupulous combinations of rich men, but in the end the wholesome laws of trade must prevail, and wealth, like the rain, must flow in the great and benign currents of circulation. Let labor be free to follow the same large system, and to combine its forces in due order, and co-operate with capital alike by wise use of the gathered wages of workmen and judicious loans from the hoards of the rich. Something surely is to come of this union, and before many years, less will be thought and said of soldiers, generals, and kings, and far more of the great hosts of industry, and of the leaders who know how, alike by their energy, science, capital, and character, to stand at their head, and guide their grand march to the new ages of peace and humanity. Our America should not be behind hand in this work.

A Sensationalist Physician.

From the time of PARACELSUS, whom BROWNING found a charlatan and left a genius, down to NEWTON and the suave JACOB, some of whose related exploits savor of the miraculous, the invalid world has been dealt with by many marvellous leeches. But among them none has worked after a fashion more utterly opposed to the usual course of nature than a Paris physician, whose funeral has lately been celebrated with much pomp at the Church of the Madeleine. His name was VICTOR DUMETZ, and the peculiarity of his treatment was that his consultations were given and his prescriptions dictated only when he was asleep. Something like this we have seen here in the operations of our so-called clairvoyant doctors. But these are in most, if not in all cases, persons without scientific training, who profess to effect their cures by some abnormal agency, and some preternatural insight into the patient's condition. DUMETZ was a regularly educated physician, and a member of the Faculty of Medicine at Paris, and his system appears to have differed from that of his professional brethren in no other respect than that it could be exercised only during sleep. At a certain hour every day he was carefully put into this condition by his step-mother, who seems to have had some peculiar mesmeric power over him, and he was then ready to receive his patients.

If DUMETZ's method of practice was curious, the manner in which he came to be a physician was hardly less so. Originally he was a vine-dresser in Champagne, and at that time subject to frequent fits of epilepsy. M. LOYSON DE GUINOMON, the editor of a review at Rheims devoted to phrenology, mesmerism, and kindred branches of what for a better name we shall call the pseudo sciences, conceived the idea of treating DUMETZ mesmerically. The patient had a tendency to somnambulism, and the mesmeric trance speedily developed his mental resources. One day while under its influence he announced "that he would be cured if on Easter Day, after having communicated, he should be taken to a certain pond in the vicinity and thrown in." With much reluctance and many misgivings this novel cure was tried, and attended with entire success.

The good M. LOYSON DE GUINOMON, a pious Catholic, accepted this extraordinary event as a miracle at once, and regarded M. DUMETZ as one plainly chosen by Heaven for some higher destiny than dressing vines. He entered him at the Jesuit College at Fribourg, where, his academic course completed, DUMETZ applied himself to the study of medicine, passed his examination successfully, and as we have said, was duly enrolled among the Paris Faculty. Whether his studies also were made and his examination passed while he was asleep, does not appear, though that would seem essential to a symmetrical rounding of the marvel. The fact certainly seems to be undisputed that his medical knowledge served him only during sleep. That he was not regarded as an impostor is shown by the fact that he numbered among his best friends such men as JULES FAVRE, EMILE OLLIVIER, Père HYACINTHE and LAMARTINE, while a very large fortune earned by his practice attested its success.

Occasional events like this give us a suggestion of the tremendous possibilities of that vast unknown empire of sleep whose resources we see dimly and fantastically shadowed in dreams. Without altogether accepting VICTOR HUGO's daring hypothesis, that in sleep the spirit actually frees itself from the body, hovering over it like an exhalation over a marsh, and so from that vantage ground directing its motions, it is evident that the phenomena of this condition are as yet practically unknown to us. Poets, like COLERIDGE in "Kubla Khan," are said to have been composed in dreams. The line in "Lochiel's Warning," "And coming events cast their shadows before," which the poet had vainly striven to find all day, came to him in sleep, a celebrated divine relates that the most eloquent passage in a sermon he was preparing was written down in a fit of somnambulism. One may strive to account for exceptional acts like these. The mental excitement of composition, we may say, defeats itself. The channels of utterance are choked by a multitude of half-formed images, and the true thought firmly impressed on the mind is yet hidden behind this barrier. Sleep, relaxing this tension, and dissipating these partial impressions, not sufficiently vigorous to retain their hold, brings into relief the perfect idea. But for the operations of a mind discharging at all times its natural functions only in a state which generally implies the utter cessation of mental activity—how is science to account for this?

Gen. Howard and the Apaches.

The telegraph informs us of another tragedy in Arizona not far from the scene of the Wickenburg massacre. Two trains are said to have been attacked and two men, SAMUEL COLLEDGE and THOMAS HARRIS, to have been murdered by the Apaches. Such, at least, is the first report; in a day or two we shall probably be told that the murderers were not Apaches but Mexicans; and there will then doubtless follow the usual bewildering succession of statements and contradictions.

In the present instance, the attack was made within four miles of Camp Dale Creek, at which post are three companies of regulars, one being cavalry. One account says the two murdered men were in the employ of the stage company, and, as there were others of the party, no doubt the alarm could instantly have been given at the fort. Nevertheless, as we construe the dispatches received, the assassins proceeded to plunder the station of Martinez Ranche hard by, and to run off the stock there. It is clear that, whether Indians or "Greasers," these murderous scoundrels of Arizona have become very bold, and the inference seems unavoidable, since there are plenty of troops on the spot, that they have been dealt with too leniently. The strong disposition to shield the Apaches manifested by certain officials in Arizona may originate in humane and honorable feelings; but if these savages as a consequence are to rob, shoot and scalp at their own sweet will, there really appears no particular good in keeping a large force of United States soldiers in the Territory for the ostensible purpose of preventing them.

Under these circumstances, the action of the Secretary of the Interior, information concerning which has just been made public, will give general satisfaction. Gen. O. O. HOWARD, at the request of the Secretary, proceeds to Arizona, as the special agent of the Government, with express instructions to inquire minutely into the late outrages and to report generally upon the temper of the Apaches as regards the whites. He is to talk with the Indians, find out what he can of matters respecting which there is no definite official information. He has been entrusted with wide discretionary powers aiming at the establishment of a peaceful understanding with the Indians, and failing this it will be expected that by some means or another the assassinations and thefts of late so deplorably numerous will be quickly checked. It is to be hoped that Gen. HOWARD will discover what the Apaches want and what they mean to do. At present they seem to have been encouraged into the belief that they can take scalps, rob the stages, and run off cattle whenever they please. We have had soldiers in Arizona, and we have had philanthropists, and the two seem to work and to argue from antagonistic positions, and so to neutralize each other. Now Gen. HOWARD is in himself both soldier and philanthropist, and so can understand the difficulties and aspirations of both classes. We may be sure that his earnest wishes will be to act with the utmost humanity; and we trust the result of his mission will be to stop the shedding of blood in Arizona, whether it be that of white men or red.

Progress in Japan.

A correspondent of the Allgemeine Zeitung gives a very interesting account of Japanese progress. He says the Mikado continues to astonish the world by the reforms which he accomplishes. Schools are the object of his particular attention. At Yedo alone five new colleges, capable of accommodating from fifteen hundred to three thousand children, have been established, and the largest house in the city has been specially set apart for instruction in science and modern languages. Twenty-three Frenchmen have been engaged as military, and ten Englishmen as naval instructors. Meanwhile manufacturing interests are not neglected, and twenty shoemakers and ten brewers are on their way from Bavaria. The civilizing influence of lager will no doubt, therefore, soon begin to tell upon the Japanese. The writer says that it is nowadays a title of honor to do the very things which would have cost you your life but a short time ago.

In order to put an end to the immoral practice prevalent among the poor of selling their daughters, a Commission will be appointed with the view of making arrangements for the State to take the children under its protection and educating them. The Daimios are, meanwhile, having a rather bad time of it, and probably survey all these innovations with no slight dismay. A good many of them have been summoned to Yedo, to prevent their interference while administrative changes are being made in the provinces. The large force of soldiers which these chieftains have been accustomed to keep about them, will be disarmed, and portions of land will be allotted to the men in compensation. The Code Napoleon is being translated, and will become the basis of a new system of law. Religious affairs also come in for their share of attention, and the very strong step has been taken of ordering the Buddhist temples to be closed. The new postal administration has had rather a bloody commencement in the assassination of two letter-carriers. An English steam-ship has been purchased by the Government as a training ship.

The Japanese have suddenly evinced a passion for pet animals. Any one who has rabbits to sell had better expect them to Yedo at once. Innumerable at three fetched $30. Cows, pigs, horses and dogs are also in brisk demand. IWAKURA, Prince Minister, formerly Minister of Foreign Affairs, who is now, we believe, on his way to this City, was, it is stated, opposed to all changes until he made acquaintance with Minister LONG.

A Marvelous Coincidence.

London is rich in "sensations" just now. What with the Alabama claims, the Tichborne trial, the "very extraordinary story" of the missing Russian, Mr. BAIRD, the big diamonds from South Africa, the arrest of EDMUNDS, the "respectable solicitor," who is supposed to have murdered his wife in 1868, and a host of minor wonders, lovers of the marvelous have a sumptuous feast. The dastardly attack on Queen VICTORIA, of which the cable has just told us, completes the series of exciting incidents; but before that, as reported in the papers of Feb. 17, something happened to people of lowlier station so curious as to have caused universal surprise and comment.

One night, just before the date named, some of the dwellers in Harringay Grove, Hornsey, were alarmed by a swift succession of piercing shrieks. A gentleman ran to the spot whence the sounds seemed to come. Following them, he found himself on the banks of the New River, close by a railway station; and here, standing in the water, but only immersed to her waist, was the woman who was screaming. A man was holding her up; and the inference suggested by the relative situations of the two was that the woman had tried to drown herself, that the man had prevented her, and that the excitement had brought on hysterics. The man, too, appeared somewhat unsettled by the novelty and nervous strain of the situation, for he cried fiercely to the gentleman who ran up, "Who are you?" and "What do you want?" Without replying, the other, aided by two or three more who arrived, dragged the woman out of the water, and managed to carry her to the Police Station. The next day she was taken before Col. JEAKES, J. P., and charged with attempting to commit suicide, and was thereafter remanded to a day beyond that of the departure of our last mails.

Now, in all this, so far, there is nothing very odd. Women often try to drown themselves in London, and are often taken before Magistrates and charged with the crime. But, on the primary investigation, something came out which is not common at all. In the first place, it appeared that the man PEARSON, who was found apparently striving to rescue the woman, was found in exactly the same spot trying to rescue another woman, who also sought to drown herself, last October. Next, this last-named woman proves to have been the sister of the girl who attempted her life in the same way just now. Lastly, the man PEARSON declared that he had missed his train, was walking home, and met the woman. She asked him, as a stranger, the way to Westgreen; and soon after he saw her jump into the water. From this it is to be gathered that a single person, by extraordinary coincidence, rescued two sisters from drowning, within three or four months of each other, one, at least, of the two being quite unknown to him; and that, by a still more extraordinary coincidence, the two women attempted suicide by drowning on exactly the same spot. The natural conjecture that the two might be in fact identical is met by the production of both sisters, and the admission by each of having made the suicidal attempt. The occurrence is altogether most remarkable, and would furnish a fine complication for one of Mr. WILKIE COLLINS' stories.

THE ELECTION FRAUDS.

Further Testimony in the Case of Henry Wiser Against Assistant Alderman Robinson—How Illegal Voting was Carried On in the Eighth Ward.

The Assistant Alderman Committee on Contested Seats, consisting of Messrs. SIMPSON, CUMBSEY and STACOM, continued their investigation in the case of HENRY WISER against ISAAC ROBINSON, Jr., the former claiming to have been elected Assistant Alderman from the Fifth Assembly District, and that he is, therefore, entitled to the seat now occupied by the latter in the Board.

The first witness sworn was LEVI HEYER, of No. 67 King-street, who testified that he voted for Mr. WISER for Assistant Alderman in the Thirteenth Election District of the Eighth Ward. Mr. HEYER was the thirty-ninth witness who testified that he voted for Mr. WISER in that district, although only fourteen votes were returned for that candidate. WILLIAM H. SHARP, No. 48 King-street; Mr. WILLIAMS, No. 48 West Houston-street, and AUGUST GREBE, No. 155 West Houston-street, also testified that they voted for Mr. WISER.

Mr. PETER MITCHELL, counsel for Mr. WISER, offered in evidence the poll-list of the Thirteenth District, on which there were fifteen more votes returned than there were actually cast. The name of ADAM MAY, No. 108 Varick street, occurred twice on the poll-list. Counsel said that he would show that there was only one ADAM MAY living in the district. It was also found that ANDREW CONLEY and ANDREW O'CONLEY voted from No. 26 West Houston; Martin Opilhe, No. 198 Varick; Francis L. Palmer, No. 257 West Houston; D. H. Quin, No. 38 Macdougal; Samuel Walsh, No. 257 West Houston; William Ward, No. 108 Varick, and John Weaker, No. 139 Varick. Counsel offered to show that CHAS. LAUNDRY, No. 92 King-street, did not vote for Assistant Alderman, although the poll-list returned him as having so voted. He would also show that eight voters whose residences were set down at No. 321 West Houston-street, did not live there, that the men who so voted were simply repeaters.

The Committee then adjourned until Monday afternoon next at ½4 o'clock, when the frauds practiced in the Seventh District of the Eighth Ward will be investigated.

Nineteenth Ward Railroad Reform Association—Protests and Vigorous Action to be Taken.

The Nineteenth Ward Railroad Reform Association met last evening. The Committee appointed at the last meeting to obtain, if possible, an injunction to restrain the Harlem Railroad Company from running trains on the Fourth-avenue, reported that they have obtained sufficient grounds to enable them to get an injunction issued. They further report that they have had serious charges against the Company, which will be laid before the Grand Jury. Resolutions condemnatory of the open-cut road and approving of the arched road were adopted. Mr. WATSON, whose failure of leg from the effects of injuries sustained by being run over on the avenue, spoke, and Gen. W. GRAHAM reported the events of the appearance of the Joint Committee of the Railroad Association before the Joint Aldermanic and Assistant Aldermanic Committee on Railroads, and expressed his astonishment that the members of the Committee of the Common Council did not think it worth while to be present on Thursday, as appointed. JOHN COLLINS made a short speech, advocating strongly the indictment of the Railroad Company, and moved that a torchlight procession, headed by the Associations, and attended by all able-bodied men in the district bearing pick-axes, be organized. It was finally adopted and said resolution was referred to the Executive Committee.

OHIO.

The Buckeye State for Grant and Dennison—The Cincinnati Commercial Discomfited—New Congressional Apportionment—Ohio Woman and the Suffrage.

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Monday, Feb. 26, 1872.

The action of the recent Republican State caucus has made the editor of the Cincinnati Commercial unhappy. You are already informed that a resolution indorsing GRANT for renomination was unanimously adopted. The editor of the Commercial is under the impression that this caucus was a small affair, and that it was manipulated in the interest of GRANT by the State Executive Committee. These are decidedly mistaken impressions. The caucus was notoriously large; was attended by both the Central and Executive Committees of the State; by the Republican members of the Legislature; by a large number of citizens and prominent Republicans from all parts of Ohio. It was an open caucus extensively advertised in advance, and from which no Republican was excluded. That Gen. GRANT will be indorsed by the State Convention which meets in this city on the 8th of March, no intelligent citizen of Ohio will deny. That Ohio will send a united delegation to the Philadelphia Convention in favor of GRANT's renomination is as certain as anything future can be. It was to be expected that the action of this caucus would cast a shadow over the handsome brow of this Cincinnati editor. This Napoleon of the Western Press has not allowed a single midnight to pass within a year without clipping or writing some charge or insinuation against either the fitness, capacity or patriotism of Gen. GRANT. He has even copied some of the vile slanders of that pandemonium the New-York Sun. But there is a confidence in GRANT's integrity and patriotism that cannot be shaken by groundless newspaper accusations, however numerous and vigorous, and Ohio is as sure for GRANT in the November of 1872, with a popular Vice-President and a good canvass, as she was in November of 1868.

GOV. DENNISON FOR VICE-PRESIDENT.

A movement to make Ex-Gov. DENNISON Vice-President in place of COLFAX, was started in this city less than one month ago. DENNISON was not consulted in the movement. The egg was laid and hatched by Gen. COWLE, editor of the State Journal, and there are now enough Dennison chickens in Ohio to give him a united delegation at Philadelphia. The movement has struck the popular heart here, and the Press, almost with one accord, have given it endorsement. The State caucus, which met on the 14th inst., passed a series of resolutions warmly commending the Ex-Governor, without a dissenting voice. The movement is based upon a sincere desire to recognize the valuable services of Gov. DENNISON to the party, and is prompted by a conviction that his nomination would strengthen the ticket, but there is not on that account any lack of confidence in Mr. COLFAX. There is still another reason why Mr. DENNISON will be vigorously pushed at the Philadelphia Convention. The nucleus of the so-called Liberal Republican movement is in Ohio. Their National Convention is to be held in Cincinnati in June. Ex-Gov. J. D. COX, Judge STANLEY MATTHEWS and Hon. JACOB BRUNSHOUT (Judge of Supreme Court of Ohio for fifteen years) are leading the movement. It is possible that this movement, if adroitly managed, may weaken the Republicans of Ohio, and make this a doubtful State. Our election is in October, and a defeat in Ohio in October might endanger the election of a Republican President. The nomination of DENNISON would take Ohio out of the list of doubtful States.

APPORTIONMENT FOR CONGRESS.

The recent act of Congress increasing the number of Representatives, allows Ohio twenty members, a gain of one. The present General Assembly is canvassing a reapportionment, but at this writing it is questionable whether a majority can be secured for any of the many new schemes. There is a prevailing sentiment in favor of allowing the present apportionment to stand, and of electing a Congressman at large. Ohio, according to the census of 1870, contains a population of 2,665,260. This leaves a ratio of 133,263 for each Congressional district. The Eighteenth Congressional District, as at present constituted, (composed of Cuyahoga, Summit and Lake Counties,) contains a population of 189,619. This district contains Cleveland, a city that has had a remarkable growth during the last decade. The two Cincinnati Districts, (Hamilton County,) which contained sufficient population for two members under the apportionment of 1861, now contain a population of 260,276, or 6,126 less than two full ratios. It will be seen by this that Cincinnati has hardly kept pace with the average growth of the State.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The Ohio Woman Suffrage Convention closed a protracted session in this city a few days ago. Mrs. SWISSHELM was the leading spirit. The meetings were very slimly attended, and nothing was seen or heard during any session creating either interest or enthusiasm. One evening, after Mrs. SWISSHELM's oration, she asked if any male citizen was present who was opposed to woman suffrage; if so, she would like to have him stand up and give his reason. To the surprise of nearly every person present, the serious-minded Chaplain of the Ohio Penitentiary arose. Some one on the platform hinted to Mrs. SWISSHELM his calling and position, when Mrs. SWISSHELM inquired if he had any women in the Penitentiary. "Yes," responded the Chaplain, "we have twelve, and they make more trouble than the whole nine hundred men!" The woman suffrage movement here is in a comatose state. The women of Ohio are very generally happy and at home.

INDIANA POLITICS.

Interesting Personal Reminiscences by Hon. Schuyler Colfax.

In a recent letter to a friend in Indiana, drawn out by the announcement of the death of Col. NORMAN EDDY of that State, Vice-President COLFAX says:

"I heard of Dr. EDDY's death with the deepest sorrow, and with the sincerest sympathy for the family he left behind him. Always of opposing politics, we were always personal friends; and I often heard of his defending me behind my back from the attacks of even his own political friends. We had a very exciting joint canvass for Congress in 1848, lasting for nearly three months, but not an offensive word was uttered on either side; and we often alluded to it afterward as having laid the foundation for a mutual regard, which we hoped would be as lasting as our lives. You may not know how nearly we came to being even warmer and closer friends. When he returned home from Washington, in the Spring of 1854, to ascertain the public opinion of the district on the then pending repeal of the Missouri Compromise, we had an interview in his law office, in the presence of his then partner, Judge DUNLAP. He said, half jesting and half earnest, 'You have been stirring up this excitement to carry the district for yourself, for Congress, next Fall.' But I replied at once that if he would pledge himself to oppose the repeal to the uttermost, I would put up his name at the head of my paper the next week for re-election. He expressed his surprise, but said it was too late, for he had pledged himself to act with Judge DOUGLAS and his party, and could not break his word. He lost his re-election in consequence of that vote, and I felt more regret at having to defeat him politically than at the defeat of any one of the other gentlemen I ever canvassed against. He was political Attorney, I think, he would have retained in Congress for years; and you can guess, as well as I, whether he would not have been likely to become an earnest Republican in either of us. You know all about his holding the Collectorship of the district and our conversations after my re-election in 1856. I asked Dr. EDDY, Senator, I think he would have retained him temporary appointment, for, though we widely differed, he had served his country faithfully, returned home poor and maimed for life, and deserved well of the Republic. I shall never cease to feel sorry, and feel that we have lost a man of noble nature and of generous impulses."

ALPINE TRAVEL.

The Pass of St. Theodule in 1871—One Day Only from Zermatt to Vincennes.

It was toward the end of July. We had been a fortnight among the Alps, and now our last stage was to be from Zermatt to Chatillon, Switzerland to Italy. In order to have a good point of departure, we had transferred ourselves to a solitary inn on the Riffel, two hours above Zermatt, passing through a forest, and then coming out on the bare shoulder of the mountain on which the house was perched. Here we secured bed-rooms, and, by way of recreation for the rest of that day, leaving our knapsacks, walked to the summit of Gornier Grat, a point between nine and ten thousand feet high, standing in an amphitheatre of snowy mountains. The path up was wild and rough, great patches of snow lying among the stones, and fresh heaps of broken rocks succeeding one another, as on mounting each you thought you had reached the summit. At last we gained it, and a very positive, unequivocal top it was. The cap of the mountain was only a few yards wide, and required no traversing in order to reach the views. To see the whole panorama you had only to turn around. It is considered the grandest mass view of Alpine scenery. We sat there an hour, surrounded by peaks, passes, and glaciers. The heaped-up summits of Monte Rosa rose heavily above them all, its huge slopes of snow looking to slope beneath so that it seemed possible to pitch a quoit upon them. But between the breast of the mountain and ourselves there dowed, miles wide, a river of ice. Four glacier streams, marked by their lateral moraines, were joined together, and seemed to sweep in a rapid race around the cliffs on which we stood, down into the valley behind us. So flood-like was the ice that at first you could fancy you saw its waves heaved and rolled along. They were moving, it is true, and on a still day it is possible you might have heard the ice-waves groan and crack as the glacier ground its slow way over the rocks; but when you looked steadily all was as motionless as death. Carrying the eye along to the right from the summit of Monte Rosa it traveled over five snow mountains, and then, making a slight dip, showed us the pass of St. Theodule—our road into Italy. Just behind us was the Findelen glacier, in a crevasse of which a Russian gentleman perished miserably two years ago. One guide had crossed in safety; another was about to follow the traveler, when the latter slipped into the crack. As the men looked over the horrible brink, they saw him far below, wedged in between two walls of ice, with his head down, waving his right arm, which was free, for help. They lowered their rope, but it did not reach his eager clutch. They ran to fetch another—for miles, for ages, it seemed. Five times did the hour hand of the prisoner's watch creep its tedious round, and all that time he waved his arm, slower and slower in dumb, piteous entreaty, until at last it dropped. Of course, when the tragedy was over, every one knew how it might have been averted, and the Chamouni guides were loud in their condemnation of the blockheads of Zermatt, who let their master die. Nothing is easier to do than the deeds which a rival has failed to perform, when the chance for doing them is gone.

On our descent to the inn we all stopped, and had a triangular snow-balling match. Did you never feel how, when you have been under grand and solemn influences, nature is obliged to throw in a few gambols to restore the proper balance between seriousness and gayety? What prim people are who never unbend! A man becomes an automaton when he cannot turn again upon occasion into a boy.

Next morning, which was Sunday, we got up with a pleasant prospect of rest. There was a little service twice at the inn, and we wandered during the intervals among the rocks. We hoped to ascend the Ciman di Jazi the following day, and looked at it with an air of contingent possession. This mountain is only four hours walk from the Riffelberg inn, and gives a grand view over the plains of Italy. But we were disappointed. On Monday morning the snow fell so thickly that we could not see ten yards from the windows of our room. When the cloud lifted, which it did once during the morning, we found ourselves in a world of snow. It was very singular and even solemn—that Arctic scene in mid-Summer. In the afternoon the skies cleared, and though it was too late to commence our journey, we were compensated for our disappointment by the sight of an avalanche. It fell from the Jung Frau. I would have stayed a week rather than not to have witnessed it.

We were on the inn-porch when some one cried out, "There it goes." Turning to the direction indicated, a monstrous avalanche met our view. It had started from the high snows and came crashing down upon the granite ridges beneath. More like a white waterfall than moving snow it looked in the distance, the powder of the pounded ice rising in clouds like mist. We were three miles off, but the sharp report of the mass as it bounded from ridge to ridge, reached us like a lengthened peal of thunder. The rush lasted three or four minutes, the mass of snow and ice pausing twice in its descent, and then breaking away with another leap and crash. After this there were some small descents within sight and the echoes of other and greater ones within hearing.

There are three kinds of avalanches—the "dust avalanche," such as that we had witnessed, composed of loose snow and pounded ice; the "slide avalanche," a large mass that falls off like a ship from the stocks when she is launched; and the "bind avalanche," which does not break into powder, but holds together and comes down with a mass. The last are worst, for they suffocate men and animals upon whom they fall. The others can be struggled from, if the victims they overtake are not buried too deep or mangled on the rocks.

Avalanches fall during the Summer rather than the Winter. Hence traveling in the snow, by winter or spring, is safer than it is, the most dangerous in the Spring and beginning of warm weather. Indeed, as long as Winter lasts, some passes are more practicable than at any other time, the snow filling up the irregularities of the ground. The paths are marked by black poles, which stand up above the snow and look like telegraph posts. The greater danger to the Alpine traveler in Winter comes from the snow-storms, or fourmentes, which soon bewilder him, shutting out the view beyond his outstretched arms. Then the additional cold tells upon the wanderer, and, after dragging his benumbed limbs as long as possible, he sinks upon the snow and sleeps to death.

But to return to the Riffelberg inn. Luckily we had plenty of wood, and so kept up a blazing fire. I read through an ancient newspaper left by some tourist, and played chess with a French gentleman who continually put back his piece when he found by my subsequent move that he had made a bad one—like his nation generally. However, I didn't correct him, as he seemed to be enjoying himself amazingly, but I contrived somehow to give him two drawn games, in which he might retrace his steps as much as he liked, and he came the better for it. This settled him and satisfied me. Meanwhile the snow began to fall again in a thicker and gloomier cloud. There was but one saloon in the inn—a roughish deal-boarded apartment—and as one traveler after another came in we were getting crowded. Two or three German ladies brought out their knitting and worked with their silvery needles as tongues. The rest of their party lit their cigars. What, therefore, with this and a snow-fleeced engineer who entered, we had a London fog of mist and smoke on a very respectable scale, but we were merry, and when night set in, piled a great heap of logs upon the hearth and played "puss-in-the-corner" and "blind-man's-buff."

The next morning was fine, and day broke clear as crystal over the mountain peaks. We awoke while it was still dark, dressed as quickly as possible, swallowed a hasty breakfast with our staves in our hands—for we had nearly forty miles to walk, and could lose no time—and set off toward the glaciers which we had seen below us at the Gorner Grat. We took a Zermatt guide, who struck across the ice till he reached some rocks, which we had to climb on all fours. When we had scaled these we found ourselves on a plain of snow, into which, as it was new to us, we put our best mark. It was of the purest white, and lay like a mantle over the huge, gently-rounded shoulder of the mountain. Right across it, rising up as clean and sharply-edged as a steeple seen over downs, was Mount Cervin, glowing bright red in the sun which had not yet reached us.

I shall never forget it. This obelisk, rising up out of a vast swell of snow, looked as I used to think the North Pole must look, only a little larger. But there was little time to give heed to anything but our footsteps, for the seeming depth of snow really covered, in some parts, a glacier, which was a good deal crevassed, and over which we had to proceed cautiously. I thought we had lost our first man in one crevasse. We were not tied together as we should have been, and all at once, instead of a guide stalking along, I saw nothing but a hole in the snow, and heard a voice from it cry out for help. We ran to the hole and saw the man, with his hands, he had slipped into a crevasse, but striking his alpenstock down into the snow, hooked himself fast and scrambled out. We paused, and went more slowly, the first man feeling his way with a pallid cheek to those who followed to prevent his falling into the grip of his. I was last, and had taken rather deep water when it came to my turn. Once I popped into a crevasse up to my middle, and felt that I could kick about in space, and hit my toes against something hard and resistant like a wall; but I got out somehow on my elbows, thank God, though I seemed for the moment all heart and was a pulse.

It was bitterly cold. We wore vails. The guides had woolen mits over their huge hands. The wind was so keen that we tied handkerchiefs over our ears to prevent their being frost-bitten, the gentlest of flying snow biting like small shot. When we reached the summit of St. Theodule, we found a hut, into which we crept. It was about eight feet across, and so full of wood smoke that we had to sit down or be choked, there being a stratum of breathable air only about four feet from the floor. This hole was kept by a brown, withered little old man, who immediately began to make us comfortable by mulling some wine in a frying-pan, and apportioning it to each of us in a basin. It was the right thing, at the right time, in the right place.

This hut on the St. Theodule is remarkable as being the highest human habitation in Europe. It is scarcely six feet from sill to rafter, windowless, doorless—for you creep into it through a hole like the entrance to a pigeon-house, and borderless, as it contains but one apartment; but it is constructed of the heaviest timbers, and is anchored firmly upon the rocks. Within it is perfectly dark. But it was to us a timely hostel, relieving us from the blinding glare of the snow, and shelvering us from the intense cold.

Resting here for an hour, we commenced our descent. There was a glacier in our way, but we passed it safely. Breuil was the next place we stopped at, and had a capital lunch. This over, and a few miles of descent made, when Italy burst upon our view. I know of no sight equal to it. The frozen stream of seracs in Switzerland is on one hand sublime, but it is clothed with eternal ice on the other—around you the crowd of Piedmont peaks that know no season but Winter—and yet below you, at your very feet, perpetual Summer! It seemed hardly an hour during which we passed from rifts of ice to fastnesses of vineyards, the grapes hanging in rich purple clusters over our heads. We had to go through such sudden changes of climate in a single day. In the morning, hard frost, icy wind, and a horizon of snow; at noon the rarified atmosphere and fierce cold of eleven thousand feet above the sea, in the afternoon a walk over glaciers and winter drifts, and at sunset the soft air of an Italian valley, peaches and nectarines, grapes and plums on the table of our inn at supper, and the windows of our bed-rooms set wide open to the pleasant evening breeze. EDITING A NEWSPAPER.

Experiences of a Substitute—Remarkable Scenes in a French Newspaper Office.

The editor of the Cigare is obliged to leave Paris for four and twenty hours; the sub-editor selects this precise moment for being ill, and M. Aristide Grisan, the Nestor of the staff, is absent canvassing a provincial constituency in his own and the Liberal interest. So the editor sees nothing for it but to ask M. Timoleon Tartine, before starting, kindly to discharge his functions for a single day; and M. Tartine, who would have undertaken the command of the Army of the Loire at five minutes' notice, consents with pleasure. However, the editor feels some slight misgivings; not that he mistrusts M. Tartine's head, but he knows his heart—M. Tartine is prone to enthusiasm. Wherefore, in getting into the train, the director of the Cigare points out to his chronicqueur, who has come to see him off, that after all there will not be much to do, that he has given the main directions for the next number, and that the principal thing will be to watch that nothing creeps into the leaders or the notes likely to hurt the feelings of Gen. de Ladmirault, an awkward person to offend by reason of the state of siege. M. Tartine promises. Then the editor conveys a counter-warning against insidious Government secretaries who prowl about seeking admission for semi-official paragraphs in influential papers; but at this M. Tartine protests with so much warmth that he would recognize a Government Secretary even disguised under a bear's skin, and perceive the drift of his prose though it were couched in Sanskrit or Carribee, that the editor feels reassured. In another minute the train has disappeared, and M. Tartine walks out of the station with a four-and-twenty hours' kingship of the most popular organ in Paris.

Having about sixteen hours to spare before he need commence his duties—for this is evening and the Cigare does not appear till 5 on the morrow—M. Tartine goes and dines, and thence to the play; and, being of communicative mood, he tells what friends he meets that it is he who for the nonce rules the destinies of the Cigare. The result of this is that by midnight the report has been flashed down the whole line of boulevards and into every newspaper office of the capital that M. Tartine has been intrusted with a post which he will fill, not for a day—for rumor is fond of additions—but for a month, some even say six weeks; and at 11 o'clock the next day, when he comes down to the office, M. Tartine finds a whole throng of affectionate friends, who, knowing his benevolent disposition, shake him by the hand, offer him their assistances, and mean while would be much obliged if he would render them some little services which they will explain if he will just give them each five minutes in private. Truth to say M. Tartine has slept as soundly as did the great Condé on the eve of Rocroy. Intrepidity is his characteristic, and he has received the functions deputed to him, expecting nothing and fearing nothing; and the levée of suitors takes him a little aback. Nevertheless, he rallies on recognizing in one a popular novelist, in the other a fluent debater, in a third an enterprising money man, and he gallantly leads the way into the editor's room with the two novelists following him, shutting the door to exclude the other two. He has not much to ask has the man of fiction; he simply wants the Cigare to announce a novel of his that is coming out. "Oh, certainly, with pleasure," says M. Tartine; what is it entitled?" "Oh, there's a new idea in the title!" answers the author, modestly. "It's Les Chevaliers du Boudoir; but the scope of these works often needs to be explained to the public beforehand, so that they may not go away with wrong impressions. This is a realistic study of life. Perhaps something in this style would do," and he draws a paper from his pocket. "I didn't write the article myself, it was my friend did it; I think you; I know I may rely upon you; good morning," and he vanishes, leaving M. Tartine to read: "It is with immense satisfaction that we announce a new work from the pen of M. A——, the gifted author of Les Fiévres Roses, Le Scandale du Bon Ton, and so many other delightful books. Anything more piquant in style, more interesting in plot, or more thoroughly artistic in conception than this new novel, into which M. A—— has thrown all his minutely realistic powers of description, his——" "Yes, but stay," cries M. Tartine "this reads like an advertisement," however, he has no time to move, for the door opens again and in rushes the fluent debater, distancing the money man by a head. "My dear M. Tartine, look at this!" he ejaculates, displaying yesterday's Cigare; "here is the parliamentary report, and, to begin with, my speech, as you observe, is most humiliating, ly curtailed; but I shouldn't complain if it were not for this passage. See, I have a discussion with a member of the Left, a Radical, and you give him the best of it, for after his joke at me—a miserably small joke—you add, 'hilarity on all the benches;' just as if I had made no repartee!" "But did you make one?" asks M. Tartine. "Why, of course," answers the fluent debater; "at least, if I hadn't, you know, it ought to come to the same thing; for if the Cigare, an orderly journal, gives the palm to men of that sort—Red Republicans, Communalists and destroyers of society—what are we to expect?" "I think, perhaps," dares a paper in extracted from the waistcoat, "if you would kindly insert this little note—I didn't write it myself; it was a friend who did it. Thanks. I know I can confide in your courtesy. Good morning." And he, too, disappears, yielding his place to the money man, who comes just as M. Tartine has read this much: "By a printer's error in our yesterday's impression, the brilliant witticism by which M.B——, the eloquent member for ——, utterly pulverized M. C——, the Radical Deputy who interrupted him, was omitted. M. C——said——" "Pardon me, my dear M. Tartine," interposes the money man, "I am away now; I only wanted your time to. I shall not be a minute. Here is the Cigare's money article of yesterday. Do you see these lines? They may prove the death of the Oyster-shell Joint Stock Utilization Company, in which the savings of thousands are invested; and I am convinced nothing can be farther from your thoughts." "Nothing," assents M. Tartine. "Well, but look," grasps the money man, "You say there is a depression on our shares. Only think of the immensity of the undertaking on which we are embarked! Picture to yourself the millions upon millions of oyster-shells that formerly lay about idle, but which now, through our instrumentality, may be made the means of pouring gold into the homes of the penurious. Ours is no mere speculation; it is a patriotic enterprise; and surely a journal like the Cigare ought to encourage it. Oh! I know what you were going to reply; but even supposing it to be true that the shares were depreciated, will the saying so in your paper tend to make them go up again? Remember, it is in the interest of our shareholders—our trusting shareholders—not in my own, that I am urging this. And" (more confidentially) "entre nous, I may as well tell you that I am not going to stay in the Oyster-shell Joint-Stock Utilization Company." "And that is not all," remarks M. Tartine grimly, when this chapter of woes is unfolded to him. "To-morrow I fight Capt. Spadasse, of the staff, with swords. When next you go out of town pray don't ask me to edit the Cigare. Once in a way's enough." "I think so, too," answers the editor.—Pall Mall Gazette.

A Chinaman's Impudence in Cuba.

"Big money is——." Well, I would rather not tell you it for true. Suppose I was to give you one million, another, you would not know whether it was right or wrong, though somebody not here, in this country, might know it, and so get me into trouble if I gave it you accuracy." Here the object of my particular inquiry looked at me askance. I fancy no eyes save those of the true Mongolian type have this peculiar power so fully developed. The eyes were set aslant, running in toward the nose, and were turned on me with a hesitating and suspicious mien. "No matter for your name then," I said, rather careful not to disturb my subject, "only it's hard, you know, to write anything about you without calling you something." "Well I tell you," was the reply, "there are many John Smiths in this country, so many no man can count him. Kin, in Chinese, is anybody's name—you call me Kin—so when people in your paper read about me, so many people called Kin, that nobody will know me." and here he smiled.

"I was born," he continued, "at Sun-Sing," my knowledge of geography, especially of Chinese towns, being limited, and the sound of it resembling somewhat quite a familiar one in the State, I begged him to repeat it. Taking my pencil he wrote it down Sun-Sing very neatly. "You don't know Sun-Sing? It is a big town—a very big city. You say 300,000 or 400,000 people here in New-York? Sun-Sing bigger nor that. It is a seaport in the province of Quon-tong. Some English and American ships go there, but Chinese vessels come there most. It does a trade in everything, but principally in teas and silks. When I left there I was a little boy. My father and my mother were dead. My father, as far as I recollect, must have been well to do. He kept thirty looms going, and his business was to make silk ribbons and tapes, and what you call bindings here. I went to a good school, and could read and write very well before I left home. I had an uncle, who was my guardian. We did not love one another. I might have been bad; all I know is, that he never gave me a holiday. I rather think I was wild, and that was the reason why he licked me. I could not stand it, remembering how kind my parents had been to me, so, one day, I took a boat that was sailing away and ran off to Macao. I sold there two months. How I lived I don't know; think I starved a good deal there. One day a Spanish agent found me, offered me $12 if I would go to Cuba, and I took his money and went. What does a poor China boy know about what Cuba, or America, or where any place is? There was 600 of my people on the ship. She was a Spanish vessel. They treated us badly; just like animals. There was enough to eat, but it was of the worst kind, and the ship was like a house of swines, what you call pig-pin. Many of my people were as young as me, and some younger. Not many die, however, only two or three. Well, I got to Cuba, and hoped for good times. They put me straight in a prison-barracks, but I only stayed there two days. After that somebody engage me, and I went away off into the interior of the island on a sugar plantation. I was fortunate enough not to be placed in the fields, but was taken into the sugar-house. I worked very hard night and day for many years, may be as much as sixteen years. By and by, little by little, I get a better place, until I got to be an ingenio, that's what you call mechanic. But Chinaman have no chance in Cuba. After I had served out my time, by saving all I could, I went into the market. By minding my business, I get along quite well. I saved a good deal of money; when I left I had $6,000 at least. I kept a grocery. Most of my money was in horses and wagons. I left them all behind me. I had to go on account of the revolution there. Many of my friends, the Chinese, were on the side of the Cubans, and as I had found them more kind to me and my people than the Spaniards, I suppose I liked them best. When I came to Cuba, they gave me a Spanish name. I am not going to tell you what it was, for the same reason that I will not give you my Chinese name. I said to myself—if you stay here, and Spaniards see you so comfortable, they will say you help your people. Some of my friends were arrested; some were shot, whose had their heads twisted. One fine day I make up my mind not to stay more. I only take with me what I could put on my back, my worst clothes. That was two years ago. You see Chinese have a long head. I think if things go bad now, they will be worse in two three years; and I was lucky. But what mistaken. I go to the coast, small sailing-ship come. I say, "want cook, cabin-boy, anything?" and they say "yes;" and I come here, and am glad. This a good country. No slaves here; no down on Chinaman. Only in California, my countrymen tell me, Chinaman have poor luck there. How this happen? Not the same country, not the same mandarin there as here? Here I find trade almost right off. I make cigars; can make as well as any Cuban man. I get sometimes, when I work hard, and I work hard all the time, three dollars a day, and I save money.

"What do you do with your money, put it in savings bank?" I asked. "Savings bank! What for? I read newspaper every day. First thing I do is to read news from Cuba, next thing I read is savings banks, one, two, three hundred. I think one likely to put every day. No, Sir; I keep my own money."

"Can you tell me anything about the condition of your Chinese in Cuba?" Again there was the same appearance of dread in making my disclosures, and the fear was expressed of compromising himself. "You see if I tell you all, I know Spanish people take all I have left there. I no expect to see my money more there, but it might happen that I get it. Now, you make me talk, and maybe I lick all my money away." Chinaman thought nearly a minute before spoke. "It took some time to assure him that his pseudonym of Kin and his own insignificance would protect him against further loss, when he continued in a much more excited way:

"I tell you, Chinaman have no chance in Cuba. You see, we make bargain for six years, eight years. If we go on a plantation, we get every year two pants, two shirts, one hat and two pairs shoes. Some of our people are great gamblers, and at the end of that time have no money. But most all of us are very saving. Many go through their eight years having saved all their money and more besides. The bargain was that we should be free and go where we liked. You think they do that? No, Sir; Chinaman have to stay. You work eight years and try to go back. Policeman take you. He say to you, 'What you do you lazy dog; why you not work?' You say, very much afraid: 'Me done work; me work eight years—no sabe sugar.' He say: 'Lazy work again.' 'But I want to go home; and can pay my passage to China.' He say: 'No ships go there, and you must stay.' Then he take you by the collar. May be, if you got money, you give him a half an ounce, or an ounce, of gold, and he let you go, but in five minutes somebody else have you, and say just the same thing. End come all the same. You have to go to plantation again. They put you in barracks like when you first come, and you work eight years more. Niggers had enough in Cuba, but Chinaman is worse. Some chance of nigger being free, but none for Chinaman. Beautiful country and bad government. Suppose you say, 'No I will not go to plantation.' You do foolish thing. Then they put you on government work, and you get nothing at all but blows with a stick and nothing to eat. Chinamen kill themselves all the time in Cuba. So many Chinamen there that there are many bad ones; wicked people in all countries. You want story about plantation? You write it for newspaper? Well I tell you. It is true—if you think not true, you ask people who know, and they say what I say. On a plantation a bad overseer was murdered. Machette most cut his head off. Some bad Chinaman did it, no mistake about that. Nobody but Chinaman work there. Chinaman we all know do it, and Spanish man who own plantation know it too. This Chinaman was a big strong man, good worker, cut more cane in one day than other man can in two, three day. You think they punish this man? No, Sir. He too good hand. When cane season come, work behind hands, if you kill him what they do? Somebody must be killed because overseer had his throat cut. They look around and pick out one, two, sick Chinaman, so week he cure to die soon. 'You are bad fellows,' they say; 'you kill overseer, you cause good part earnestness;' and they twist the necks of these two sick men, who not good to cut cane, and the big, strong man got off. That true story, you write Kin say so."

The cigar he was smoking was more rapidly puffed. If interviewing the ordinary Chinaman is some what a difficult task, firstly because he is naturally very reserved, and secondly, for the reason that pigeon English, with a Spanish flavor (in this particular instance) is rather a hybrid and monstrous language, when speaking to him about his home, his tongue becomes suddenly wonderfully loosened. He spoke some Spanish, a little English of the ornithological character, and, for what we know, a little Chinese. "Go to China? Ah, yes. When I make cigar, now that I am much happier, me think of it. When I burn in the sun, chop, chop cane, I think of it. I want to see the graves of my father and mother. I work for that, and will go back there some day. This good country; but China over so much better." "What would be called a rich man in China?" I asked.

"A man having $5,000 a year in the class I was born in would be immensely rich. With $100 a year I could live splendid. Could afford five wives, look no use of children. My country is a good place to make money in. Little money I will go back some day."

"Would you know your relations, if they?" I asked. He was now in and comfortable mood, when a wide grin, a grunt, roll of the head, and with tremendously high heels, and thick gloves on his hands.

"Certainly; they would call me Sun-Sing, or foreign devil, if I didn't."

"What about your pig-tail?" I inquired. "Could you wear a false one?"

"No, it would have to grow; a shave one would be a degradation."

"How many Chinamen are there in New-York?"

"Not more than 200; I know that. We have a society. I can't give you its name, because it is a secret one. It is for our good. No poor Chinaman goes to the hospital; we take care of him."

"Much obliged—time heavy."

"Some." Our Chinaman evidently was considering himself as pretty well pumped out by this time.

"One question more. What about your doctor here?"

"He is very good, and much liked by our people. He speaks—how? Plenty learned; and he is very kind to poor Chinaman. You see, the Chinese here are not very sick yet. Perhaps the best trade is mine, that of cigar-making. There are some candy-sellers, and some have some few other trades. There are, too, some cooks. So the doctor can't have a very paying practice. Now good evening. Please don't put my real name to this—write it Kin," and saying this with a timid glance, he shook hands with me, asking me to keep for him a Sunday paper, in order that he may be assured his real name shall not appear before the TIMES readers.

Suicide by Shooting.

EDWARD CHEREVOY, a native of France, fifty-five years of age, committed suicide, yesterday afternoon, by shooting himself in the head with a revolver, at his residence, No. 40 King-street. But very few details of the affair have been obtained for publication, and the reasons which prompted the man to self-destruction are not definitely known. He had been in poor health for some years, and this is supposed to have so depressed his mind as to result in partially insane. At about 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon, while alone in his bedroom on the second floor, he placed the revolver to his right ear and fired. Death ensued soon after.

A Card.

OFFICE OF HUDSON G. WOLFE & CO., No. 18 South William-street,
New-York, Feb. 28, 1872.

I desire to state to my friends and the gentlemen who may have received a circular signed "Udolpho Wolfe Co." calculated to intimidate dealers and prevent the sale of my BELL SCHNAPPS, that in dissolving Aromatic Schiedam Schnapps, I do not, in any sense, UDOLPHO WOLFE, and beginning the importation and sale of Schnapps for my own account, I carefully avoided any imitation or resemblance which might be construed into an infringement of the rights of the late; preferring rather to build up my own reputation by giving goods of the best possible quality at reasonable prices. I should, indeed, be most sorry to imitate the goods put out by his concern, either in quality or style of package, and lest some of my friends might be disturbed by the contents of the before-mentioned circular, I would state that the injunction of the Court, which I have, has been obtained on account of their putting up an imitation article, calculated to deceive, and lead buyers into the belief that they were buying "UDOLPHO WOLFE'S Aromatic Schiedam Schnapps." Thus the injunction on these grounds is right and proper every fair-minded person will admit, and no person can be better pleased than myself at the result. At the same time I do not propose to deter my friends and customers to be intimidated and frightened out of the use of my goods, and I hereby give notice that any person selling my BELL SCHNAPPS will be held harmless against any action which may be threatened or brought against said persons, and such action will be defended by me free of charge.

Respectfully, etc.,
HUDSON G. WOLFE,

The Progress of the War—Appointment Sanctioned—Awaiting the Imperial Visitor—Insurrection Gains.

HAVANA, Saturday, Feb. 24, 1872.

The question as to what is going on in the Interior, and more particularly in the Eastern Department, is frequently asked and always remains unanswered. To a certain extent, the most complete mystery exists in relation to war matters, and if the New-York journals did not occasionally refer to the war in Cuba, it would appear from the aspect of Havana that no war was in progress, and that a lasting and profound peace had been re-established. The few items published in the Havana journals confirm the fact that fighting of a desultory character continues from the jurisdiction of Sancti Spiritus to the easternmost end of the island. Every Spanish battalion is reported to be moving about, and from all sections of that part of the country still in insurrection the cry comes for more troops. Col. MARIN captured a hospital near Guanuri, taking the Cuban Capt. JULIAN ARNAIZ and four others prisoners, having during a four days' march killed two Cubans. The Rayo battalion captured seven Cubans and killed six men belonging to the command of the Cuban Col. FIDEL CHAPEROS. A number of men belonging to the former party of MANUEL AGRAMONTE have surrendered, and this ex-Cuban is now issuing a very long-winded manifesto to the Cubans still in arms, thus following the example of almost every Cuban who has abandoned his cause. AGRAMONTE employs the usual rhetoric, and no more need be said on the subject. AGRAMONTE may do as he pleases, but if VALMASEDA's offers of pardon have not produced the desired result, it is extremely doubtful that a turncoat will succeed. Some Santa Cruz firemen and soldiers killed four men of ROKKA-CHEA's troop near Santa Cruz, and the report that IGNACIO AGRAMONTE's scouts, who were sent out to collect horses, had been unsuccessful and met with defeat, is confirmed. The Matamoras guerillas killed the Cuban Colonel MIGUEL GALIXTO FIEDRA and four of his men near Bayamo, several men of the troop of CICILIO GONZALES being also killed. A very severe engagement occurred on the 18th and 19th at the banks of the Sagua and Berraco Rivers; the Spaniards were commanded by Gen. CAMPOS, and the Cubans by MONSERO DIAZ; according to trustworthy reports the Spaniards lost about thirty-five men killed and wounded and the Cubans almost fifty; full particulars are wanting. The neighborhood of Las Tunas continues to afford the young Spanish officers a chance of distinguishing themselves, as the Cubans persist in hovering near the town, worrying the convoys and fighting the troops to keep their hand in. The Cuban Capt. LORENZO ADOLERDO and eight of his band were killed during an attack on a convoy, guarded by three companies of the lately-arrived troops, the latter losing fifteen men.

AWAITING ALEXIS.

The Havana populace is on the qui vive previous to the arrival of Prince ALEXIS, and a little of the New-York enthusiasm seems to have found its way to this city. The floors of the Palace have been cleaned, the walls have been whitewashed, and several rooms papered, thus giving the building almost a respectable appearance. The residence of the Countess of SANTOVENIA, the widow of Gen. DULCE, has been fitted up nicely, and presents a very neat appearance. The Marquis of AGUAS CLARAS, the Chairman of the Board of Aldermen, has superintended the furnishing of everything, and any member of the Tammany Ring would have voted to place the Marquis in an insane asylum, if they had seen him buying everything in person, and taking great care that not a nail should be wasted or paid for more than the usual price. On the arrival of the Prince, the men-of-war and forts will fire a royal salute; the Prince will then land and drive to the residence prepared for him in the Cerro, the volunteers and regulars lining the route of the procession. The authorities will then pay their respects to him. On the second day a grand official dinner will be given at the palace by the Captain-General; on the third day a performance in honor of the Prince will take place at the Tacon Theatre; on the fourth day the Prince will visit Matanzas and the Caves of Bellamar; the night of the fifth day is set aside for the ball to be given by the Board of Aldermen; the sixth day is to be devoted to visit the famous plantation Las Cañas, belonging to Mr. JUAN POEY, and on the night of the seventh the grand ball will be given by the Spanish Navy on board of the frigate Gerona, which has unshipped her guns and is being put in complete order to prepare for the event. The programme may be modified, but runs thus at present. The festivities will be attended by the foreign residents here, the Consuls of the different nations having been requested to send in the names of all distinguished prominent resident countrymen. The visit of the Prince has given tailors and dress-makers a great deal of work, and nearly all classes of artisans, and all stores, will have been benefited by it.

AN AMERICAN FETE DAY.

The 22d has been celebrated in a quiet but becoming manner by the American residents here. The flag-ship of Admiral LEE, the Worcester, fired a salute of twenty-one guns, and all Spanish, the German and Swedish men-of-war and many merchant vessels were gaily decorated, and had unfurled the American flag. An impromptu ball took place on board of the monitor Terror, and was well attended. Capt. QUACKENBOSH and his officers doing the honors in a most amiable way. Among the ladies present were a number of Cubans. Among American ladies were Mrs. Benjamin Lawton, Mrs. McCaun, Miss Sauvalle, the Misses Wiley, Goodman Porro, Mrs. Foster, Miss Springer, Mrs. Fanny Bartlett Oviedo, Mrs. Torbell, Mrs. Kimball, Mrs. Landers, Miss Cohner and Miss Zina Delti, the prima donna. The quiet Americans had a quiet dinner at a quiet saloon, and some were carried quietly home by their friends at a quiet hour in the morning, the memory of GEORGE WASHINGTON having slightly unsettled their minds and bodies.

MISCELLANEOUS GOSSIP.

I learn from good authority that when Admiral LEE called to pay his respects to Captain-General VALMASEDA, the latter stated to the Admiral that the revolution would be completely suppressed in two months, to which the Admiral replied, through the interpreter: "Tell his Excellency that in just the same thing he told me a year ago when I called on him." Mr. WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT, his brother and Mr. DURAND left yesterday for Mexico on the English steamer. A call is published in the Havana journals requesting all French ladies to come forward and raise subscriptions by aid in paying the indemnity due to Germany. The decline in sugars in New-York has had a corresponding influence on prices here, and some merchants refuse to purchase even at the present lower rates. Unless a further decline occurs, there are no fears of any crisis, as the large speculating bodies are sufficiently strong to suffer heavy losses and remain solvent. Should any failure, however, take place, it will produce others at once. The speculative fever, which raged for a couple of months, has abated considerably, and Havana merchants are once more convinced that Wall-street's best advice is to keep free from the fever, irrespective of the Cuban sugar crop or the pretensions of planters and merchants. Whether willing or not, Cuba must of necessity play second fiddle to New-York; money rules and New-York has it.

An order is published in the Gazette ordering a registry of all slaves, with their corresponding permits or cedulas. I shall find out the cause of this sudden legal outburst, intended, perhaps, to reduce the negroes to a level with the new Chinese slaves. QUASIMODO.

Curious Story About Gen. Harrison's Watch.

From the Indianapolis Sentinel, Feb. 26.

About seventy years ago Gen. WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, while in camp, with his troops on WINE, is called the "Governor's Trace," at a point ten miles north of Jasper, Dubois County, lost his watch. It was one of the old style, double-cased silver watches, such most of our readers will remember having seen in the possession of their grandfathers, many years ago. The outside case of this watch was found in 1814, and the inner case was found about twelve years ago. The remaining portion, or what remains of it, was found in fall by Col. BASIL B. BONNERSON, Clerk of Dubois County, and by him brought to this city to be placed in the cabinet of relics in the State-house. The portion found by Col. BONNERSON consists of the upper and lower plates, which constitute the frame of the works, and the brass cap. Nothing remains of the works but the "barrel" and "fuses," the latter much rusted. All the best has been carried up by rust. The upper plate bears the inscription, "Louis and Price, Philadelphia, No. 78."

SATURDAY, March 2—P. M.

In point of lawful Money strength the Bank movement, on the return of the week, shows no improvement, the surplus over the required 25 per cent. being not quite $3,500,000. The Banks lose in Greenbacks $1,273,500, and gain in Gold Notes $443,000. The decrease on the general line of Deposits is $2,846,400. The loans are nearly the same as last week—$305,400 less.

The Treasury Office received for Customs during the week $3,061,000, and paid out $3,597,000 March Interest on the 10-40 5 ₱ cent. Loan. The imports of the week are reported from the Custom-house as $14,000,718, of which $7,278,717 is in Foreign Dry Goods. Both the total and the Dry Goods are the largest ever reported, for any single week, at the Port of New-York.

Money was in good demand at 7 ₱ cent., but there was no trouble among borrowers to make up their Bank accounts, although extra rates of Interest were reported early in the day.

The sales of Gold were at 110⅛ ▸ 110⅜ ▸ 110⅛ ▸ 110⅜ ▸ 110⅛ ₱ cent. The sales of Bills on England at 109⅝ ▸ 109¾ ₱ cent., less a small brokerage. The market had a firm look in the forenoon for both Gold and Exchange, but closed a fraction easier later in the day.

On the Stock Exchange the Public Funds were firmer on the 5-20s of 1867, and generally steady in prices at the close, with only a moderate offering of Bonds. The speculation in the Railroads and in Telegraph and Pacific Mail was active and prices generally higher than on Friday. The business was especially large in Pacific Mail and Northwest Common and Union Pacific. After the late Board, at 4 o'clock P. M., (the Saturday hour for closing the Exchange,) the following quotations were made as compared with Friday night:

BANKING AND FINANCIAL.

₱ THE 8 PER CT. FIRST MORTGAGE SINKING FUND LAND GRANT BONDS OF THE ST. JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY RAILROAD COMPANY, in denominations of $1,000, $500 and $100, Coupon or Registered, can now be obtained to a limited amount only from the undersigned, or through the principal Banks and Bankers throughout the United States.

The safety and reliability of these Bonds is strengthened by the continued and increasing demand for them by investors and capitalists, who have satisfied themselves by their own careful investigation, and have learned to know after a close and rigid examination of the security offered for their payment, both interest and principal.

THEY ARE SECURED by a first and only mortgage on the Company's railroad, (which will soon connect the Union Pacific Road at Fort Kearney with the City of St. Joseph, Mo., already the terminus of railroad lines,) upon the Franchise of the same—upon the Equipment and personal property of every description—upon the Land Grant of the Company granted by Special Act of Congress, approved July 23, 1866, amounting to 1,700,000 acres, which has been officially Certified to the Company by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to be official report to Congress, transmitted through the Secretary of the Interior on Jan. 30, 1872.

The Bonds are issued only as they represent a completed and equipped Road; all proceeds of Bonds beyond this are held by the Trustees in trust until the necessary completion entitle the Company to these proceeds.

The Road is built first-class in every particular, and has been so received and accepted by the Department of the Interior.

The Mortgage Deed of Trust prohibits the sale of any of the Company's Lands at less than four ($4) dollars per acre, payable to the Trustees and applied to the payment of the Bonds, through the operation of the Sinking Fund. The payment of the Bonds before maturity is not compulsory upon the holders.

The Bonds are therefore secured by two classes of property combined in one mortgage, the value of either largely exceeding the amount of bonds which can be issued under the mortgage.

Trustees—Farmers' Loan and Trust Company of New-York.

The Bonds have thirty years to run, with both principal and interest payable in Gold. The Principal payable in New-York, the interest at eight (8 p. c.) per cent., payable in February and August either in New-York, London or Frankfort on-the-Main, free of tax.

Price 97½ and accrued interest in Currency. The Bonds are receivable at par and accrued interest in payment for the Company's Land Sales. Maps, circulars, documents and full information furnished on application.

The Bonds of this Company have always been received with favor by investors and capitalists, have always commanded a ready market, and we unhesitatingly recommend them—believing this loan will rank equally with that of the Eastern Division issues, which are now selling at a premium above par.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

No. 123.—Traders' National Bank of Chicago vs. Campbell, Assignee in Bankruptcy.—Appeal from the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois.—This was a proceeding to recover of the bank the amount of a debt which it had received from the firm of Hitchcock & Endicott, by a Sheriff sale of their property, under an execution based upon a confession of judgment in favor of the bank, made when the firm was insolvent and under a threat of arrest, unless it was done. The bank had lent money to the firm, and some alleged fraudulent representation having been made, also the bank becoming suspicious of the solvency of the firm, took this means of collecting the debt. The Court held that this confession of judgment was an act of bankruptcy; and that the bank obtained the benefit of an unwarrantable preference, and the decree was that the bank must pay over the proceeds of the sale made at its instance, and also a considerable sum of money in the nature of profits, by them, which also had been levied upon. It was said that although the act of Hitchcock and Endicott, in confessing judgment, was done under a sort of duress, still they must be held responsible for the consequences of the act as if in all respects voluntary. This appeal is taken from that decree, and it is insisted that the conclusions were not warranted by the facts or by law.

George C. Campbell for appellants; M. W. Fuller for appellees.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Before Judge Blatchford.

In the matter of Thompson Greenfield, bankrupt.—A voluntary petition in this case was filed in August, 1867. The petitioner was adjudged a bankrupt, and an assignee appointed to administer the estate; and the bankrupt received his discharge in due course from the Court. Previous to 1862, he had been a partner in the firm of Fellows & Co., of New-Orleans, the firm consisting of Fellows, Logan and the bankrupt. The firm expired by limitation in September of that year. In February, 1863, the partners, Fellows and Logan, filed a petition in bankruptcy in the District Court of Louisiana, praying that all the members of the firm, viz., Logan, Fellows and Greenfield, be adjudged bankrupts. This was done, and an assignee appointed, who sold some real estate belonging to the firm. The purchaser applied to this Court to affirm the conveyance. The register to whom the case was referred, decides that the proceedings in the District Court of Louisiana were void, for want of jurisdiction; that the assignee appointed by this Court should proceed by petition against Logan and Fellows, to have them declared bankrupts; and that said assignee should obtain possession of all the partnership property of the firm; and that neither the proceedings in this Court nor in the District Court of Louisiana, are of avail to convey the interest of the members of the said firm to any assignee in bankruptcy in either Court. In these conclusions of the register, Judge BLATCHFORD concurs; and avows that the proceedings to be taken by the assignee, as above referred to, must be by way of supplement to the proceedings pending in this Court.

In the matter in which ALEXANDER B. OGE, who held assigned policies issued by the Manhattan Fire Insurance Company to sufferers by the Chicago fire, which policies were not paid on presentation, had petitioned to have the Company adjudicated an involuntary bankrupt, the petition was withdrawn by mutual consent, and the matter of distributing the assets of the Company was left in the hands of the receiver appointed by the State Court. It was stated that the creditors of the Company will get about forty per cent of the amounts owing to them. A petition by the same person, to have the New-York and Yonkers Fire Insurance Company adjudicated an involuntary bankrupt, for substantially the same reasons as those assigned in the case of the Manhattan Company, was put over to be argued next Saturday.

IN ADMIRALTY.

Before Judge Blatchford.

The Boston, Newport and New-York Steamboat Company vs. Steam Propeller Oceanus.—This was a case of collision between the steamboat Newport and the propeller Oceanus, which occurred on the afternoon of Nov. 27, 1867, while the vessels were rounding the Battery into the East River. The libel alleges that the collision was caused by the Oceanus running up at high speed, and attempting to pass the Newport in a narrow channel, under such circumstances as made a collision almost inevitable. The answer denies that there was any negligence on the part of the Oceanus; that she had a foremost place while approaching the Battery, and that the Newport crossed her bows by a sudden and improper change of course. Decree dismissed the Judge BLAGHFORD, who delivered the opinion, said that the Oceanus pursued the only path open to her, and that the cause of the collision was entirely with the Newport. Libel dismissed with costs.

BANKRUPTCY BUSINESS.

The following adjudications in involuntary cases were made during the week ending March 2: Andrew King Chandler, Albert F. Geschendt, Morris Harris. Discharges were granted to Gloucester F. Dewey, James H. Taylor, William Fleming Smith and George Mellanes.

Co-education of the Sexes at Cornell.

From the Syracuse Journal, Feb. 29.

Some months ago, Hon. HENRY W. SAGE, of Brooklyn, one of the members of the Board of Trustees of Cornell University, made a proposition to endow the institution to the extent of $250,000, burdened only with the single condition that females should be admitted to the privileges of the University upon the same footing as males. In an examination of the subject, President WHITE and Mr. SAGE visited several colleges of the West, where this system is pursued, and sought information to every direction. The results of their personal examinations—and they evidently were very thorough ones—were given in detail in a lengthy report read to the Trustees, recently, by the President. A mass of correspondence from presidents of colleges, principals of normal schools and academies, and from every possible source where information could be asked was given, and the conclusion reached seems emphatically in favor of the co-education of the sexes. Mr. SAGE proposes to advance $150,000 for the erection of a building, of which one-half shall be expended in this year and one-half in 1873. The remaining $100,000 to remain as an endowment for the benefit of this University. The location of the building, plans, &c., have not as yet been settled upon, or seriously discussed. The matter is entirely left in the hands of the Executive Committee of the University, with Mr. SAGE added as a member. The report of President WHITE is to be printed.

Office of S. T. SUIT & CO., LOUISVILLE, KY.

We have bought up the greater part of all the old Kentucky Whiskies in the world—we mean of goods older than distillation of 1867. The stock of this character of goods is smaller than has been known, and we have made this extraordinary operation merely to supply the wants of our own trade, and not with the view of increasing the price, for we offer them to the trade at the same prices they have been heretofore held. We have goods of the distillation of 1855, and every year from that to this date.

Fine old Sour Mash Whiskies; finest grades of Kentucky Rye Whiskies, of real age, warranted. We sell every package under absolute and unqualified guarantee of satisfaction.

SUMMARY OF AMUSEMENTS.

Dramatic and Musical.

The coming week, unlike the last, promises to be one of the liveliest of the dramatic season. Mlle. Nilsson's lovely voice will be heard once more in the Academy, and that charming singer's legion of admirers will doubtless pester in greater force than ever. "Mignon" begins the operatic series on Monday; that extravagant novelty, "Trovatore," will be hammered at again on Wednesday; "Martha" will be sung on Friday, and—for the matinée—"Faust" is promised on Saturday. All this will be acceptable, no doubt, if in no sense novel. ... On Monday Mrs. John Wood, fresh from the fostering congratulations of Mr. Charles Reade, will begin another American career at Niblo's Garden. The piece selected is Mr. John Brougham's "La Belle Sauvage." It is announced that Mrs. Wood's London Burlesque Company are to appear with her; but, as Mr. Mark Smith has been engaged to sustain the chief male part of the play, we infer the "company" to be rather a matter of name than substance. Mrs. Wood's acting has been well relished here in years gone by, and as those who have seen her in London testify to her subsequent improvement her engagement will doubtless be profitable. ... A change is made at Booth's to-morrow. Mr. Creswick, an actor of highly respectable powers, and, in some parts, of elaborate finish, is to act Brutus, and Mr. Edwin Booth Cassius. Mr. Edwin Booth is far better adapted to the latter part than to the former; and the new "reconstruction" of "Julius Cæsar" will be witnessed with interest. Mr. J. B. Booth, who has been warmly greeted by old friends during his engagement here, leaves for Boston today, whence on Monday, the "Black Crook," exiled from Niblo's, takes possession, in all its glory, of Mr. Booth's theatre. ... It is true that Mr. Sothern is to act at Wallack's Theatre and bring out his new pieces there in the Fall; it is not true that Mr. Wallack relinquishes the management or leasehold of his theatre, or has had any idea of so doing. Mr. Wallack has accepted some engagements in other cities, which will be fulfilled while Mr. Sothern plays at the theatre here. ... March 18 will witness—miraculo dictu!—the 200th performance of "Diverce." Mr. Daly may wail now, for there are no more worlds to conquer. He means to take comfort nevertheless in "the latest extraordinary Parisian sensation," which it seems is not "Rabagas," nor yet "Le Roi Carotte," but something different, which they who live, as the Italians say, will see. ... Mr. John F. Cole, of the Grand Opera-house, announces that: "By reason of the report of our stage manager that he will necessarily require the immediate free use of the stage for the proper production of the great spectacle of 'Lalla Rookh,' by Monday evening, the 11th of March, there will be no theatrical performance here until that date." Mr. Cole might have added that by reason of the powerful non-attractiveness of the opera company lately singing in his house, this judicious step was still further recommended. It is far from our desire to speak unkindly of public entertainments, or of artists, of whatever class, but the operas given at the Grand Opera-house during the past fortnight have been positive insults to the public. There are meritorious artists in the troupe. Mme. Ferreri is one, Mr. Muller is another, and we gladly testify to the promise of Miss Elzer, who sang Annchen in "Der Freischutz," on Thursday, quite charmingly. But with these exceptions, the singing of the leading parts has been disgracefully bad. New-York is not the place for this kind of business, and we hope to hear no more of it. "Lalla Rookh" is to be supremely gorgeous, we are told, and it will be a pleasure to know that it retrieves the season. ... The run of "Humpty Dumpty" at the Olympic continues. As in the case of Wallack's Theatre, a groundless report concerning a possible change of management at this house has been current. The theatre will remain throughout next season and, we hope, for many years, under the guidance of the admin stration, the labors of which have secured for it until now an unbroken spell of prosperity. ... "Luna" is the title of a fresh burlesque to be produced at Wood's Museum to-morrow. The Cannibals will henceforward be part of the attractions by night and by day of that popular place. ... Mr. Davies, the greatest of ventriloquists, will appear until further notice at the Union Square Theatre. ... "Cinderella" enters to-morrow upon the second week of its career at the New-York Circus.

Home Gossip.

"Faust" was sung last week at the Philadelphia Academy of Music, with Mme. Van Zandt as Marguerite, Mr. Seguin as Siebel, Mr. Castle as Faust, Mr. Campbell as Mephistopheles, and Mr. Bartley as Valentine. ... Mrs. E. F. Bowers was at the Walnut-street Theatre. ... Mr. Davenport acted in "Brutus" last week at the Chestnut-street Theatre. ... Mr. Forrest acts on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday in Syracuse. ... Mrs. Hanford was last week in Chicago. ... Mlle. Aimée's opera bouffe season at the New-Orleans Academy of Music was commenced on Monday last. ... Miss Fanny Davenport in "Diverce" was the attraction at the New-Orleans Varieties. ... The Lingard-Dunning Troupe was in Richmond. ... Miss Janauschek was last week in Savannah. She will act this week in Augusta. ... Mr. Mayo and Miss Comme acted in Hartford last week. ... Mr. McKean Buchanan is in Denver, Colorado Territory, under medical treatment for paralysis. ... On Feb. 26, while a rehearsal of "The Heir at Law" was in progress at the Boston Museum, a large piece of timber, which had been used as the roll of a drop-scene, fell from above to the stage, striking Miss Annie Clarke, Mr. Frank Hardenburg, and Mr. Pitman. The gentlemen escaped with very slight injuries, but Miss Clarke was knocked senseless, the roll grazing her head and striking her left shoulder. She was severely bruised, but no bones were broken. Had the roll fallen directly upon her head her death would most likely have been caused, for the timber was heavy and fell from a considerable height. Miss Clarke was conveyed to her residence and Dr. Hovendahl was called in attendance. Her injuries are not considered to be of a serious character. Mr. Charles Barron, another member of the company, on Feb. 28 had a severe attack of pleurisy. Miss Clarke's part in the comedy was assumed by Miss Susie Clure, and Mr. Barron's was read by the stage manager, Mr. Graham.

Foreign Gossip.

Miss Agatha States and her troupe were in Sydney on Jan. 27. A Il Mondo Teatrale contains the following complimentary notice of the debut of an American prima donna in Italy on the 16th of January: "A young American prima donna has just made her debut at Vercelli, with the greatest success. The opera was 'Dinorah de Tonda,' by Bellini. Miss Bruen, who, by the way, has not changed her name, as many do who commence their career abroad, filled the principal role, and delighted a very numerous audience by the beauty of her voice and the ease and elegance of her manner. It seemed impossible to many that this was her first appearance, so exactly did she depict the beautiful but unfortunate Dinorah. Miss Bruen, who has studied both at Milan and Paris, and had from her fine voice and great beauty of person student much certainly to recommend to her debut, deserves all the greater credit for the success she has made by declaiming in a city where she was quite unknown and where neither her real name would aid her applause. We predict for her a fine career, and a place in another name to the list of American prima donnas who are singing successfully abroad." ... At the Louvois Vaudeville a burlesque of Mr. Offenbach's play, called "The Two Rose Dues of Pompadour," has been produced. ... It is said by the London Morning Post that "Mlle. Marie Marpon has received most flattering offers of engagements both from Boston and America, but she prefers to remain in Paris, where she receives more than any other lyric artist. ... Mlle. Albani has signed an engagement with Mr. Gye for the approaching season in London. ... The Spanish Minister, Madrid, has one of the most serious difficulties with the Cortes on the Cuban question. ... At the annual festival of the Dramatic Fund, Mrs. Stirling, after delivering like a three-score midwifeship, delivered, with all her finished grace of style, a charming little speech in aid of the funds of the charity. ... After divers changes, it appears that M. Vergnet, director of the Theatre Lyrique, is negotiating a lease of the theatre of the Italian Opera-house in Paris, from the 1st of September next, with liberty to start a company prior to that date if possible. ... Herr Joachim was in Russia on a tour, prior to his appearance, on the 12th of February, at the Monday popular concerts in London. ... M. Faure, although announced one of the singing impresarios of the Brussels Conservatoire, has returned to the Grand Opera in Paris. He has received the Leopold Order from the King of the Belgians. ... Herr Hans von Bülow, the pianist (the son-in-law of Dr. Liszt,) was expected to visit London this season. ... The rebuilding of the Lyrique Theatre, in Paris, which was destroyed by the Communists, has been commenced, and will be finished this year. ... M. David de Vries, a Dutch tenor, the father of the two prima donne, the sisters Fricci and Jeanne de Vries, has died in Paris, at the age of fifty-seven. ... The next revival at the Théâtre Français will be the "Turcaret" of Lesage, the heaviest satire the first half of the eighteenth century produced. It has been the custom to play this piece in Louis XVI. costumes. The costumes of the time of Louis XIV., in which the scene is laid, will now be adopted. ... From Modena, the news of the death of Signor Alessandro Gandolfi, composer and orchestral conductor, is announced, at the age of sixty-four years. ... Mr. Aptommas, the English harpist, has had such success in Berlin that he has been engaged by Herr Ullman for a tour in Germany. ... The new opera by Herr Gouvenne von Lannen, "Dornröschen," ("Beauty and the Beast,") has been successfully produced in Stuttgart. At the twelfth Gewandhaus Concert, in Leipsic, Herr Leopold Auer was the solo violinist; he played one of Spohr's concertos, and a caprice by Bugnani. ... Signor Strazzi, the sculptor, has been commissioned to execute a marble statue of Donizetti, which will be placed in the vestibule of the Scala at Milan. A new drama, in five acts, "Cause ed Effetti," by Prof. Paolo Ferrari, has met with much success in Ferrara. ... The building of the new Vienna Stadt Theatre is making rapid progress, and will be completed in the month of August. Dr. Laube, the director, will then begin the rehearsals, and the first performance will be given on the 1st of September. Herr Makart will paint the great curtain at the new theatre. ... A ballet in five acts, called "The Enchanted Shoe," arranged by the ballet-master, Herr Reisinger, with music by Capellmeister Muntdorff, of Leipsic, had met with great success in Moscow. The ballet consists of fourteen tableaux, and more than 240 dancers appear on the stage. ... The chief novelty in the adaptations from Molière, in the Turkish performances at Pera, is the introduction of female characters. The Turkish ladies, in Turkish and Armenian, supposed to be out of consideration for the Musulmah represented, but just as likely to prevent the audience from finding out that the actresses are Armenians. The "Mariage Forcé," arranged by Ahmed Vefik Effendi, has proved a complete success. ... A letter in the London Standard, says: "Verdi's new opera, 'Aida,' brought out at Cairo about a couple of months ago, has just been given with extraordinary success at Milan. The enthusiasm of the Milanese knew no bounds; the great composer was called no less than thirty-three times to the footlights, and solemnly presented with a golden sceptre set with brilliants. D'Angeri, the manager of the Cairo Theatre, sends the following telegram to Rome: "Milan, Feb. 9.—'Aida' a great success; Verdi called thirty-three times before the curtain; nine times in succession at the close. Piece full of beauties, and especially admirable the finales of the first and second acts, the duet between baritone and soprano, and the entire fourth act. The last scene one of the finest inspirations of Verdi. Opera distinguished for melody and instrumentation; splendidly executed, and put upon the stage as only in Milan. We shall see if time confirms this splendid verdict. This is not always the case, some of the most popular operas of the day having disappointed at the first representation. 'Aida,' however, was ushered in under good auspices, having already met with a brilliant reception in Egypt."

A New French Play.

The Pall Mall Gazette says: "Did not the French public make a point of filling every Parisian theatre at this season of the year, the attractions of 'Rabagas' at the Vaudeville, of 'Le Roi Carotte' at the Gaité, of 'Christiane' at the Française, and of the two pieces of M. Dumas fils at the Gymnase, might altogether distract its attention from the Ambigu-Comique, where a new drama in five acts, written by the novelist, M. Armand Malitourne, and entitled 'Les Taverniers,' has been recently produced. The plot departs from the beaten track. Les Taverniers, represented by Mme. Marie Lamont, is a nun, who, freed by the Revolution from her convent, near Toulon, at the age of twenty, has miserably crushed her floriferous years in the hovel built on the ruins of her former retreat, with no other companion than a poor French cousin. Report spreads among the neighboring villagers that the ruins conceal a treasure of which Lise is the guardian, and one Remy, a manufacturer of ecclesiastical ornaments, is confirmed in the science he gives to his robert when Lise reveals to him a specimen of her skill in goldsmithwork. That he may possess himself of the spoil, he contrives to make the fair treasure-keeper become enamored of his cousin Maximin, a deserter from the navy; for her heart has long yearned to love something, and the sailor, vagabond as he is, seems to supply the gap in her affections. The reverse of the medal—the death of Remy's wife alarms the intentions of his adherent, who now thinks he can strike into a more direct path to fortune by marrying Lise himself. By means of mendacious information, he renders Lise jealous of Maximin, whose passion he cools, on the other hand, by telling him that Lise is the story of the treasure is a mere fable. Lise, in the fury of jealousy, denounces the deserter to the authorities of Toulon, but immediately discovers that the tale of his infidelity is untrue. The flood of Maximin is thus fixed; but Remy persuades Lise that with a large sum she may purchase the prisoner's release, and she resolves to descend alone by the cavern beneath the Fellah, forbidding him to follow her. This prohibition Remy does not heed, but clandestinely creeps down after Lise, and is dazzled by the treasures surround him. So great, indeed, is his avidity that he will not spare upon Lise a mortal wound with a knife; but his meditated retreat is cut by the dying woman, who has just strength enough to open the passage of the waters into the cavern, and they both perish in a common grave."

RAPID TRANSIT.

The Central Underground Project Warmly Urged by the Committee of Ninety and Citizens' Reform Association.

At an adjourned meeting of the members of the Committee of Ninety and the Citizens' Reform Association held last evening at No. 20 Union-square, Mr. Edgar F. Brown, on the part of the Committee appointed on the subject of rapid transit, stated that after investigation they believed that the Central Underground project was the most feasible, and, in the event of the passage of the bill now before the Railroad Committee, more likely to be constructed expeditiously than any other system presented. Responsible parties had already expressed their willingness to subscribe $3,000,000 for that purpose, and the Messrs. Shepard, of this City, would be glad to undertake the work for $17,000,000. The only person who opposed the passage of the bill was Mr. A. T. Stewart, whose private interests were placed in opposition to the welfare of the general public. The Committee were of the opinion that the work could be completed at a cost of from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000, and that such could be raised if the system was amended and the road carried through Broadway. He thought that efforts ought to be directed in its furtherance before the Railroad Committee now in session.

Mr. McDonald stated that the Committee only abandoned the plan of the underground railroad, as in the short space of time in which they were in existence they had no opportunity to consult with the proprietors of other schemes. Mr. Brown and the other members of the Committee were ready to give all schemes due consideration, and while he had a decided preference for the underground plan, he would sink his personal opinions in the general interest. Addresses were delivered by Messrs. Clews, Stokes, Commissioner Doyle, Townsend and others in favor of any project for obtaining relief in this matter.

Mr. O'Leary contended that to raise $20,000,000 for an underground railroad through Broadway if a franchise was given, in sixty days, and he would set the ball rolling by pledging himself for $2,000,000 that evening, and he had no hesitation in saying it would be raised in twenty-four hours.

Finally, it was resolved that a Committee of Fifty go to Albany on Wednesday morning, and press the bill now before the Legislature. The meeting then adjourned.

The Importers' and Grocers' Board of Trade.

At a special meeting of the Importers' and Grocers' Board of Trade, yesterday, Mr. Chas. B. Hoe, from the Committee charged with the duty of protesting to the United States Senate the petition and remonstrance in regard to the proposed changes in the tariff on tea and coffee, reported that they had been assured by the Finance Committee of the Senate that the matter should be brought to a decision, one way or the other, at the earliest practicable moment, and that no obstacle that might take place would in any event prevent the revenue system from July 1 next. The report was accepted, and the Committee discharged with a vote of thanks.

AMERICAN DEMOCRACY.

The Last of the Free Lectures—Major J. M. Bundy at Cooper Institute.

The last of the free courses of lectures at Cooper Institute, was delivered last evening by Major J. M. Bundy, whose subject was "Democracy." The lecturer, after paying a compliment to the gentlemen who had preached sermons in the course, spoke of the growth of the democratic idea in this country, and the success which had attended it. Opportunities, he said, neither make nor sustain nations. It is their use that determines development and success in either case. Americans do not sufficiently bear in mind that our history is unique in the fact that here for the first time in the world's annals there was a whole people ruling themselves according to their own notions of right and justice, thinking about, discussing, and striving to carry out the principle of self-government, and public sentiment of all the existing forms of kingly or aristocratic rule. The lecturer quoted from Grote's History of Greece to show that the brightest and most productive period in that land was the one in which Athens was truest to the democratic theory and practice, and said that all Americans should be filled with an fervid a sense of the inspiring power of their institutions as was felt by the great English scholar, who has so magnificently demonstrated the triumph of democracy in Greece after carefully brushing away the mass of rubbish and calumnies that had been accumulated by historians who were determined to point a moral against the fitness of the people. Referring to the Constitution the lecturer said: Now that the Constitution itself is no longer a shibboleth for slavery, I believe that even Mr. Phillips would say that the men who made that instrument were, on the whole, the most notable and wisest body of law-makers the world had ever seen. The fundamental principles of government which they incorporated into a symmetrical system have stood unchanged for nearly a century—through foreign and domestic wars, through a series of exciting Presidential campaigns, through the entire current of political and social events, that have come and gone, and through uninterrupted and free discussion of their merits. They are today stronger in their sway over forty millions of people spread across a continent than they were over three millions scattered along a narrow strip on the Atlantic sea-board. Where else in countries inhabited by the Caucasian race have there been such marks of stability and permanence? What Constitution is so venerable with age? How many forms of government has France lived under since 1787? What portion of the vague and undefined and changing Constitution of England exists today as it existed in 1787? How many phases of government have the German States passed through, or the other European Powers? We have not yet arrived at the perfect development of our democratic institutions, but have made such great advances toward it within a few years past that we can hopefully await the future. Looking at the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution solely from a philosophic point of view, it is a great encouragement for all who believe that the broadening of the base of our political structure tends to strengthen the whole of the edifice. There was no precedent for such a tremendous extension of the full rights of citizenship. If we could have believed that the Conclusions of nineteen of our ancestors up to the beginning of the late war, the bestowal of suffrage on a race just rescued from servitude was the most hazardous of experiments, if not absolutely certain to bring about political and social chaos. Yet, when the great change came, none of the ancient plums of the State were shaken. There was less excitement than has been shown in England over a small extension of suffrage involving no great principle. Not only statesmen and other leaders of public opinion acquiesced in the result, but even the ignorant classes whose antipathy against the colored race used to be most virulent, soon secretly put aside their former pet aversion and "Fifteenth Amendment" and made sport of the "sire" assumed by the latter. Race prejudices and hates that in other countries and under other institutions would have rankled for centuries, were in an incredibly brief time submerged, if they were not destroyed, and now the negro needs no protection at the polls in places where he is in the minority, since his life would have paid the forfeit for even a chance remark on political subjects. We not only showed to the world that we were not afraid of the extremest logical results of democracy, but we increased and deepened our own faith by the same brave and noble act. We demonstrated the courage of our opinions," which is rarer with nations than with individuals, and we have been stronger, manlier and more hopeful by reason of the exercise of that heroic quality. It was the crowning triumph of our democratic institutions that this terrible test found them adequate to the emergency. Speaking of the Reform movement in this City, the lecturer continued: The acquiescence of all the better elements of our population in the authority confided to the Seventy private citizens who were elected by a spontaneous rising of a magnificent demonstration of the latent power of organization for great purposes which inheres among the citizens of a democratic country, and of the trust which they repose in one another. Had there been a tithe of this mutual confidence among the Paris Communists, they might have won their fight and secured a genuine republic. Without a shot being fired the Committee of Seventy, its successful conduct of a peaceful and triumphant revolution has excited the wonder and admiration of foreign observers, and will yet be recognized as a brilliant proof of the inherent and reserved strength of our institutions. The victory won 5878 on the 7th of November last will be chronicled as the Yorktown of our civil war, and as one of the prevalent evils that sprung indirectly out of our great civil war and local distempers of a longer growth, and the free institutions that were threatened by an accumulation and combination of disorders. The electricity that flashed the news of this victory to the Pyrenees gave new courage to every friend of Democracy and shaken sentinels who rightly counted that failure here meant eventual failure of popular institutions everywhere. New-York has borne the shame of the developments that led to this glorious result; she is now entitled to wear the honors of a self-effected redemption and vindication of honesty and patriotism. Our Republic cost hundreds millions were a cheap and paltry price to pay. Major Bundy spoke at some length of the Presidents of the United States and their Administrations. He also said: Undoubtedly the greatest dangers that now threaten our institutions are those that arise out of the very machinery by which we find most of our material progress and development. Today Democracy in this country is corrupted more rapidly than Rome, and I call at the feet of the philosophic prediction made by the Cambridge Law Professor. They employ armies of men, and these men are of all grades of capacity and influence, from the common handler of a spade to the most vigorous and adept master of affairs in the country. They wield their great influence, not openly and irritatingly, as did the Southern slave-owners, but quietly and through subtle agencies which pervade Legislative halls, newspaper offices, the Courts and society itself. You can feel Col. Scott or Vanderbilt or Gould all over the Continent. They are powerful elements in the politics as well as in the business of the land. Our present dangers can all be traced to some departure from Democratic principles. If we are disgraced and threatened by corrupt legislation and a low tone of morals in public life, it is because we have forgotten that the proper functions of government are to secure justice and to protect life and property, and have undertaken to legislate for special interests. It is impossible to define exactly where the line should be drawn practically, but our only safety is in adhering to the principle that our Government has no paternal functions to exercise over the people. They need no such nurseries. All they want is freedom to develop themselves and to work out the full measure of their energies and abilities. No Congress that ever sat can direct the activities of forty millions of free human beings as wisely as they can direct themselves. The lecturer concluded as follows: Reviewing our immediate past with devout gratitude, comprehending fully that our progress has been due, not to chance or temporary causes, but to the conformity of our institutions with the truest and most Christian philosophy, and with the direct and most fervent aspirations of our ancestors, I am filled with the conviction that all our future greatness and prosperity depend on our adherence to the Democratic principles which have guided our national development—let us here and now adopt the language of Mr. Lincoln in his immortal dedication speech at Gettysburg, and enlarge its reference for the purpose to the there fell so as to include all those who, in civil life, or on the field of battle, have lived and died for the Republic. Let us say now, as he said then: "It is for us, the living, rather to dedicate ourselves to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus nobly advanced; to consecrate ourselves to the great task remaining, and to gather from the graves of these honored dead increased devotion to that cause for which they gave their lives. Here let us resolve that they shall not have died in vain; that this nation shall under God, have a new birth of freedom and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish forever from the earth."
